"The principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but offices may be maintained in other places such as the by-laws may from time to time fix."

Amend section 5, page 6, lines 7 and 8, by omitting the words "the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Virginia, or Ohio, or any of them," and substituting therefor the words "the District of Columbia."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will state that this bill as it came from the committee was not a District of Columbia charter, and as it did not affect subject-matter over which the Federal Government had any jurisdiction, I would have objected to it; but the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota cures that evil and makes it a District of Columbia charter. There are no objections to the bill itself upon its merits, and I shall make no objection to the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission of the House to incorporate in the remarks that I made to-day certain tables and statements that I did not read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks permission to extend his remarks and incorporate certain tables and similar matters in his speech of to-day. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is a quarter after 5 o'clock, and I think that unanimous consents ought not to be asked for after the hour at which Members go home, and after to-day I shall object to all requests for unanimous consent after 5 o'clock.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business during the present Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is usual for that committee to have that privilege?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. It is; we have had it heretofore.

Mr. PAYNE. Have you had some hearings?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Why, we have had many hearings, and there are several bills before the committee, on some of which we would want to have the hearings printed. But the committee never has hearings printed unless we have felt it would be of benefit to gentlemen on the floor who might not be present at the hearings.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] reminded me to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa, in order that gentlemen may extend their remarks and save time, that the provision be agreed to providing for general leave to print in the RECORD on this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood there was such a leave granted.

Mr. ADAMSON. It was withdrawn.

Mr. HEPBURN. That was objected to. I made the request, objection was made, and I withdrew it. I would like to renew the request now, that all gentlemen speaking on the bill may have five days after the expiration of this order in which to print their remarks.

Mr. PAYNE. Remarks upon the subject of the bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. No, no.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the permission be extended to all who speak to extend their remarks in the RECORD, and that they have a little more time than five days. A great many of them are busy on other matters of legislation.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will withdraw my request and let the gentleman's request stand.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose, still, that the extension of remarks shall be directly on the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. This debate is not limited to the bill, and the gentleman who makes a speech on some other subject would want to extend his remarks in the same line as the speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They did not limit it to this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. My understanding was that the debate was to be upon the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; general debate in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Georgia if he will frame it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who speak during this debate shall have ten days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I think I will not object, as it will save the time of the House in the future.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 2012. An act granting an increase of pension to William Wilson.

JACOB B. RUSSELL.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. UNDERWOOD, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Jacob B. Russell, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. CALDERHEAD, for five days, to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the statehood bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

PAPERS ACCOMPANYING CLAIMS BILLS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was out of the Senate yesterday when some remarks were made in regard to the introduction of a paper to which I called attention the previous day. I wish simply to say in regard to it what I should have said yesterday if I had been here.

Whatever rules the Senate makes, of course, we all must conform to. I have no doubt that is a good rule, but I think rules should be made by the Senate and not by the Secretary of the Senate or by the clerks of committees. I think if there is a necessity for a rule in regard to the introduction of papers it should be settled by Senate rules. I have no objection to the rule or the practice, but I do think rules ought to be made by the proper authority.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, in order that the Senator from Massachusetts may understand my position, I wish to state that I called the matter up yesterday morning simply that I might explain that the present Committee on Claims has entered upon no different practice from that which obtained before. We have not made any innovation.

The matter arose from a misunderstanding, I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts. One of the clerks thought he could not receive papers at all until they came through the Senate. There was no disposition whatever to impose any regulations that were not proper or anything that was not in conformity with the rules of the Senate, nor is there any disposition on the part of the committee to presume to make rules. It is not a rule. It was simply a request on the part of the file clerk of the Senate that that order might be observed. At least I discovered when the matter was brought to my attention that it arose in that way. The clerks hereafter in the Committee on Claims will receive papers Senators send to them and file them with the papers in the custody of the committee.

I am very sorry that any Senator should have been put to any annoyance or inconvenience by reason of the misunderstanding.

Mr. LODGE. It is no annoyance to me, Mr. President. It is not that. It is only a matter of practice. We have been in the habit of filing additional papers to accompany bills with the clerks of committees to which the bills and previous papers had been referred. If there is to be a rule as to the filing of additional papers, that rule should be made through the Committee on Rules and adopted by the Senate. All I desire to say is that I do not think rules should be made except through the proper channel.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTUS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2355) to reorganize the corps of dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department of the Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALGER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. HEMENWAY on January 31, 1906, providing for a survey for a harbor in Lake County, Ind., reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1942) to correct the military record of George A. Winslow, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 733) granting an honorable discharge to Jacob Niebels, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1862) for the relief of Joshua T. Reynolds, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3804) for the relief of Joshua T. Reynolds, moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2051) for the relief of James D. Vernay, moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report with a favorable recommendation two statements of award, one a report by the Secretary of State showing the obligation to pay, under the convention of November 7, 1899, the sum of $760 in the settlement of Danish claims, and the other a report by the Secretary of State concerning this Government's obligation to pay that of Germany $20,000 for the settlement of certain Samoan claims. The matters have been adjusted, and I suppose the proper course would be to refer the items to the Committee on Appropriations, to be inserted in the general deficiency appropriation bill. The awards ought to be paid at once. They have remained for a good while unpaid. I ask that that reference be made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reports will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 832) to correct the military record of Asa Niles, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 285) to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, and to amend the laws on that subject now in force; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILLS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

A couple of days ago—I think it was on Tuesday—the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] called up a motion or request which he had entered on Monday, in relation to the bills in regard to the liability of railway employers. The matter was discussed until the expiration of the morning hour, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who was urgent for some action by some committee, and had been criticising somewhat severely a couple of committees, charging them with engaging in the game of shuttlecock and battledoor, was desirous to get a vote; but I wanted to make a brief statement, when the morning hour expired and something else came up. We have had nothing about it since, and my statement is in the limbo of nowhere. I should like to know where that request has gone.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has not expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am speaking about the morning hour on Tuesday, when this matter was up and the request of the Senator from West Virginia was pending. It was something in the nature of a resolution, I suppose, although it was not a resolution, either, and I want to know what has become of the matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia made a motion to refer the bills to the Committee on the Judiciary, but afterwards stated that when the Senator from South Carolina had an opportunity to be heard he would withdraw his motion to refer and ask that the bills be retained in the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator from South Carolina has not been heard, and I want to know what has gone with the business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The business will come properly before the Senate after the morning business has been closed.

Mr. TILLMAN. To-day?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To-day.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right; I just wanted to know. Nothing was done with it yesterday, and I wanted to get in my little statement sometime or other. I wanted to know when I would have a chance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 8442. An act permitting the building of a dam across the Rock River at Grand Detour, Ill., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 13538. An act to incorporate The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. TILLMAN, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to send to the Senate, if, in his judgment, it is not incompatible with the public welfare, all the correspondence and dispatches sent to or received at the State Department from our minister or other representative at Santo Domingo during the year 1904.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. NELSON. I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I make that motion.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no objection to its going to the Committee on Foreign Relations, though, as it is a simple matter of inquiry or a request for information of the President about some transactions in regard to Santo Domingo that occurred two years ago, I thought that probably it was not necessary to have any committee consider it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to remark, if permitted, that additional correspondence on this subject was laid before the committee on yesterday, and perhaps it embraces what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was just looking through the papers published for the years 1904–5, and I see nothing here since August, 1904.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps the Senator had better let it go to the committee and find whether we already have it.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask that the resolution be read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it was asserted in the Senate yesterday that it is generally understood and not denied anywhere that the President is doing what he is doing in Santo Domingo at the earnest request of that Government, if there be one there. It has also been said in the newspapers that that is not true; that the plea for help did not come from Santo Domingo, but that Santo Domingo was, in effect, coerced or has been compelled or urged to solicit the assistance of this Government.

It is in regard to that simple statement of facts that I want light, and I am perfectly willing to have the matter go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, hoping that we will get this correspondence at an early date.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution is referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The morning business is closed, and the Calendar is in order.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILLS.

Mr. TILLMAN. What has become of the railroad liability bills, Mr. President, or the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They are waiting to hear from the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. But they have not come up yet. The Senator has no right to speak unless they come up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bills will be laid before the Senate upon motion or by unanimous consent.

Mr. TILLMAN. If that be the case, I should like to have them taken up now and disposed of. I have only a brief statement to make.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bills will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 505—Senate bill 156 and Senate bill 1657, relating to the liability of common carriers.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I said a moment ago, Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia, in his remarks on Tuesday, criticised the Committee on Interstate Commerce and the Committee on the Judiciary for their action in regard to these bills, they having been sent backward and forth between the two committees for two or three years, it seems, neither committee being willing, apparently, to consider them and report them either favorably or unfavorably.

As I was instrumental in suggesting that the bills be sent back to the Judiciary Committee from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which I am an humble member, I will simply state the reason why. Having been absent last year from illness, and a large part of the preceding session, also from illness, I was not aware that the bills had been pending and had traveled back and forth between the two committees. But I am aware that the Committee on Interstate Commerce has been engaged, more or less zealously, in considering laboriously the question of rate making—in fact, to the exclusion of any and all other subjects. We have had debates there almost interminable among ourselves, and apparently, to my mind, along the line of how not to do it. I do not want to criticise anybody on that committee, but we have been ingloriously doing nothing in a substantive fashion; accomplishing nothing in the way of an agreement. We may agree later, but I doubt it very seriously.

So, finding ourselves burdened with this other far more important measure of rate making, and no one seeming willing to even think of these little bills under discussion, and feeling myself that it was largely a question involving nice points of law, I suggested that we might as well get rid of them by sending them to the Judiciary Committee. No one suggested that they had come to us from the Judiciary Committee.

Therefore I for one have not engaged in any shuttlecock and battledoor business. I am willing to consider the bills, and unless I can get additional light on them I am not willing to report them. That is neither here nor there; but I am ready now to take up the bills if they are sent back to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and we will do something with them.

That is all I want to say.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, after the statement of the Senator from South Carolina, for which I waited, he being a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, I, speaking for the committee, am willing to withdraw the motion, or request, I made that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bills and that they be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and will let the bills remain with the Interstate Commerce Committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Calendar is in order.

ABRAM JOHNSON.

The bill (S. 319) to reimburse Abram Johnson, formerly postmaster at Mount Pleasant, Utah, was announced as the first bill in order on the Calendar, and it was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate, for the reimbursement of Abram Johnson, formerly postmaster at Mount Pleasant, in the State of Utah, for amount expended by him for rent, light, and fuel, from January 1 to July 1, 1901, $73.50.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW LONDON HARBOR, CONNECTICUT.

The bill (S. 2771) to establish a light and fog-signal station on Southwest Ledge, entrance to New London Harbor, Connecticut, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the sum of $60,000, appropriated by the act approved on April 28, 1904, for establishing a light and fog-signal station at or near Black Ledge, entrance to New London Harbor, Connecticut, may be used toward the construction of a light and fog-signal station at or near Southwest Ledge, entrance to New London Harbor, Connecticut, and appropriate the further sum of $55,000 to establish and construct the light and fog-signal station at or near Southwest Ledge.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to establish a light and fog-signal station at or near Southwest Ledge, entrance to New London Harbor, Connecticut."

BREAKWATER AT NANTUCKET, MASS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE January 16, 1906, and reported by Mr. CRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, January 18, 1906, without amendment, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into the advisability of establishing a harbor of refuge by the construction of a breakwater on the island of Nantucket, Massachusetts, at or near the westerly side of Great Point, for the purpose of providing better protection for commerce and the lessening of the perils of navigation to coastwise traffic in the adjacent waters.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

FOG SIGNAL AT EDIZ HOOK, WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 927) establishing a fog signal at Ediz Hook light station, State of Washington, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to construct at Ediz Hook light station, Puget Sound, State of Washington, a fog signal and a double dwelling house suitable for two keepers, and cement walks around the building, at a cost not to exceed, in all, $10,110.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-HOUSE ON RED ROCK, SAN FRANCISCO BAY, CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 2277) to establish a light-house and fog signal on Red Rock, upper part of San Francisco Bay, California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to establish a light-house and fog-signal station on Red Rock, upper part of San Francisco Bay, California, at a cost not to exceed $30,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL ON KARQUINES STRAIT, CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 2655) to establish a light and fog signal on Karquines Strait, California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that there be established a light and fog signal on a point on Karquines Strait, California, opposite that now occupied by the the Selby Smelting Works, at a cost not to exceed $50,000, and authorizes the Light-House Board to expend so much of this amount as may be needed from the $63,000 appropriated for the construction of a light and fog signal at Point Dume, California, by the act of March 3, 1901, for the establishment of said light and fog signal and quarters.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF STATE OF MISSOURI.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] to what I am about to say. A day or two ago, when the Calendar was under consideration, I asked that Order of Business 211, being the bill (S. 567) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of certain claims of the State of Missouri, should be passed over. I had not then examined the bill, but after examining it I have no objection to it, and hope it may be now taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his objection to the consideration of the bill named by him, and the bill will be considered as before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, if there be no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 567) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of certain claims of the State of Missouri, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in section 2, page 2, line 3, before the word "all," to strike out "audit" and insert "report;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That he shall examine and report all the items of expenditures made by the State for the purposes herein named, allowing only for disbursements made and amounts assumed by the State for enrolling, equipping, supplying, subsisting, transporting, and paying such troops as were called into service by the governor at the request of the United States department commanders commanding the district in which Missouri may at that time have been included, or by the express order, consent, or concurrence of such commanders, or which may have been employed or used in suppressing the rebellion in said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALDRICH subsequently said: A few moments ago the Senate passed a bill in regard to certain claims of the State of Missouri, to which I objected on a previous day. My attention was not attracted to the bill this morning, and I now desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider is entered.

LAND FOR LIGHT-HOUSE AT PIGEON POINT, CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 2656) to purchase an additional strip of land to the eastward of the light-house at Pigeon Point, California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the purchase of an additional strip of land to the eastward of the light-house at Pigeon Point, California, to be added to the light-house reservation, at a cost not to exceed $5,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF TIMBER ON CEDED INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber, engaged in committee work, the other day when Order of Business 207, being the bill (S. 2786) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to purchasers of pine timber on ceded Indian lands sums paid in excess of the correct amounts due for timber cut, was passed over. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-HOUSE TENDER IN HAWAIIAN AND PACIFIC WATERS.

The bill (S. 2658) to construct a tender for the Light-House Service in Hawaiian and Pacific islands waters was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the construction of a steam tender for the Light-House Service in Hawaiian and Pacific islands waters, at a cost not to exceed $150,000, and authorizes the Light-House Board to employ temporarily at Washington three draftsmen, to be paid at current rates, to prepare the plans for the steam tender.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT AT POINT CABRILLO, CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 2279) to establish a light and fog-signal station near Point Cabrillo, California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That there be established at or near Point Cabrillo, California, a light and fog-signal station, at a cost not to exceed $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KEEPER'S DWELLING AT BONITA POINT, CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 2275) to provide for the erection of a keeper's double dwelling at Point Bonita, California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 3, before the name "Bonita," to strike out the word "Point" and insert the word "Point" after "Bonita;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be constructed at Bonita Point, California, a keeper's double dwelling, at a cost not to exceed $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the erection of a keeper's double dwelling at Bonita Point, California."

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE AT SAVANNAH, GA.

The bill (S. 2777) for the construction of a suitable vessel for the Revenue-Cutter Service for duty at Savannah, Ga., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $200,000 for the construction of a suitable steam revenue cutter for duty at Savannah, Ga.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWPORT, R. I.

The bill (S. 2700) to improve the public building at Newport, R. I., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected an addition to the public building at Newport, R. I., upon the site now owned by the Government, to afford additional accommodation for the mailing division of the post-office, including any necessary alterations in the present building, at a cost not to exceed the sum of $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

AGREEMENT WITH LOWER BRULE BAND OF INDIANS.

The bill (S. 980) to ratify an agreement with the Lower Brule band of the Sioux tribe of Indians in South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' ADDITIONAL HOMESTEAD RIGHT.

The bill (S. 983) to validate certain certificates of soldiers' additional homestead right, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 10, after the name "Betterton," to strike out "Dio C. W. Brashears;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the certificates of soldiers' additional homestead right, under section 2306, Revised Statutes of the United States, issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in May, 1896, under authority of the act of Congress of August 18, 1894, to M. J. Wine, assignee of Thomas O. George, Moses Roley, Andrew A. Harrison, William Bohanan, Leland L. Betterton, James R. Blades, John Pendleton, Charles M. Blair, Elbert S. Wittenberg, William D. Reynolds, John M. Walker, and Caleb Sill, be, and the same are hereby, made valid.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there a report in that case, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report, which will be read, if the Senator so desires.

Mr. SPOONER. I will inquire if the bill is recommended by the Department. I do not care about having the entire report read.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I would state that this bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Public Lands in the last Congress and then passed the Senate. It has also been favorably reported at the present session. The bill is made necessary by reason of the construction of the law by the Interior Department, which favors the passage of the bill with the amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I do not ask for the reading of the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

HOFFMAN ENGINEERING AND CONTRACTING COMPANY.

Mr. SPOONER. On the 30th of January the Senate passed the bill (S. 1648) for the relief of the Hoffman Engineering and Contracting Company. I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, in order that I might examine the report and verify the impression I had as to the matter. I have looked into it, and now ask leave to withdraw the motion to reconsider. I see no objection to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill referred to by him was passed. The bill therefore stands passed.

PUBLIC LAND SALES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the day before yesterday, when we had under consideration the general Calendar under Rule VIII, at my request the bill (S. 1031) granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State was passed over. I understand that there is no objection to the passage of the bill, and I ask that it may now be considered and acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1031) granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State. It proposes to grant to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of the public lands which have been heretofore made by the United States since the admission of said State, or may hereafter be made in that State, to aid in the support of the public or common schools of said State.

Mr. SPOONER. Why has there been this long delay in settling the claim of California?

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that California was peculiarly situated. It was never a Territory of the Union, but it organized its own government and came into the Union as a State without the special proviso being made in its behalf that was made in the case of the other States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that is a bill, as I understand, which simply deals with the State of California, is it not?

Mr. PERKINS. I call the attention of the Senator to the report of the committee——

Mr. TELLER. I do not care about that. I want to know about the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. It only deals with California.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator is mistaken. There are several other States that have claims of the same kind.

Mr. PERKINS. My authority is the General Land Office.

Mr. TELLER. Well, the General Land Office is mistaken.

CLAIMS FOR ADDITIONAL BOUNTIES.

The bill (S. 613) repealing an act entitled "An act to extend the time for presenting claims for additional bounties," and its amendments and extensions, so far as they limit the time for presenting claims for additional bounties granted to soldiers by the twelfth and thirteenth sections of the act of July 28, 1866, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to repeal the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 13, 1870, entitled "An act to extend the time for presenting claims for additional bounties," and its amendments and extensions, so far as they limit the time for presenting claims for additional bounties granted to soldiers by the twelfth and thirteenth sections of the act of July 28, 1866, and that such claims shall be considered by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury in the same manner as other claims for arrears of pay and bounty are considered; but this act shall not be construed to reopen any settlement already made by the accounting officers, except to allow additional bounties under the twelfth and thirteenth sections of the act of July 28, 1866, which have been denied upon the ground that payment thereof was barred by limitation of the statute.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to have this bill explained somewhat in detail.

Mr. WARREN. The bill is one recommended by the Auditor for the War Department and covers a certain class of extra bounties. The law of 1866 provided that soldiers who had served three years should receive an additional $100 bounty, and those who had served two years an additional $50 bounty. But it has been provided by legislation that claims presented after 1880 should not be paid. The acts provide that these claims can only be paid to the soldier himself, or in case the soldier is dead, then to his wife, minor children, or parents. All the proofs are in the Department. These claims stand exactly like other bounties due soldiers, except for the limitation I have stated. All the other bounty acts were unlimited. They are paid from time to time from the money we annually appropriate for arrearages of pay allowances and bounties. But under this particular act, because of this extra limitation, although nearly all of the claims have been paid, there yet remain certain claims, amounting to something less than a hundred thousand dollars, as stated by the Auditor. The Congress has had its attention called to this matter several times. In the last Congress a bill identical with this passed the Senate. I think this is a good bill and ought to pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATUE OF COMMODORE JOHN BARRY.

The bill (S. 86) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Commodore John Barry was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that there shall be erected in the city of Washington, D. C., a statue to the memory of Commodore John Barry, and appropriates therefor $50,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD RIGHTS OF CERTAIN MONTANA CITIZENS.

The bill (S. 541) for the relief of certain citizens of Montana claiming the benefit of the homestead laws was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that no purchaser of land under the terms of the act to provide for the sale of lands patented to certain members of the Flathead band of Indians in the Territory of Montana, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1889, shall, on account of such purchase, be held to have exhausted his or her right to enter land under the homestead laws, but every such person shall, if otherwise qualified, be, notwithstanding such purchase, entitled to the benefit of the homestead laws.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was about to ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to explain the bill.

Mr. CARTER. The bill applies to very few persons and is intended to remove a disability inadvertently imposed by the terms of the law. Under the terms of the act referred to certain lands were to be sold at public auction, and it was provided that no one should be qualified to bid unless he possessed the qualifications of a homestead entryman. This provision was made in lieu of the statement that the bidder must be a citizen of the United States.

The Land Department subsequently held that the purchasers of such land at public auction, by virtue of the terms of the law, forfeited their homestead rights. It was manifestly not so intended. In 1900 an act was passed curing the disabilities referred to, but that act applied only to sales made prior to 1900. A number of sales at public auction have been made since 1900, and this bill is intended to relieve the persons at such sales from the disabilities imposed. The Department approves the bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand it now.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

L. S. WATSON MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The bill (S. 2964) for the relief of the L. S. Watson Manufacturing Company, of Leicester, Mass., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill proposes to pay to the L. S. Watson Manufacturing Company, of Leicester, Mass., $423.17, being the amount of the fines paid by them by reason of an undervaluation of certain heddles imported by them, the undervaluation being due to mistake for which they were not in fault.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN UTAH.

The bill (S. 1374) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Utah was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Utah, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA.

The bill (S. 956) providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the district of Alaska was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I assume that the bill comes from the Committee on Territories?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported from the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who is in charge of the bill, whether or not the particular provision in the bill which gives to the Delegate only his actual expenses from his place of residence to Seattle, which is a proper provision I think, has any corresponding provision in the case of the Delegate from Hawaii?

Mr. NELSON. I am not familiar with that case. I am not sure, but it seems to me there was something of the kind in the bill. The Delegate from Alaska will get his mileage from Seattle—from the Pacific coast—and then his actual expenses when he travels outside of the mainland and in his own Territory. The distance is so immense that if a Delegate were elected from a remote corner of Alaska, the mileage would be enormous, and so we put in that precautionary measure.

Mr. BACON. I think the provision is an eminently proper one, and in listening to the reading of the bill, it occurred to me that there ought to be a similar provision with reference to the Delegate from Hawaii.

Mr. KEAN. We are not now legislating for Hawaii.

Mr. BACON. He should get his actual traveling expenses, say, from Hawaii to San Francisco. I did not know what might be the case. I believe that that matter, however, is within the jurisdiction of a different committee. That fact did not occur to me at the time I made the inquiry.

Mr. NELSON. I am not familiar with that matter, but I will say that this provision was in a similar delegate bill, which passed the House of Representatives at the last session, in respect to Alaska.

Mr. BACON. This is a Senate bill, is it not?

Mr. NELSON. This is a Senate bill, but a House bill substantially the same came over from that body last session.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator another question; and that is whether or not the committee has considered the question of the propriety of the organization of a Territorial legislature in Alaska?

Mr. NELSON. We have not.

Mr. BACON. Of course, I recognize that the conditions there are peculiar, and there may be good reasons why there should not be such an organization.

Mr. NELSON. We have not considered that question, I will say to the Senator from Georgia. The committee would probably be divided on it. But as to the matter of a Delegate from Alaska, we are all in accord. We all feel that that great big country ought to have a representative in the Congress to advise Congress as to the needs of the Territory.

Mr. BACON. I quite agree with the committee in that regard, and unless there are peculiar reasons, on account of the immense territory and the separate localities in which the different communities are located, it seems to me there are there population and interests enough of a local character to justify the organization of a Territorial government, which is enjoyed by every other Territory, certainly on the mainland of the United States, and even by the Territory of Hawaii.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTRACTS WITH THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 69) regulating the retent on contracts with the District of Columbia, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GAMBLE. I suggest that the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar, without prejudice. A similar bill, or one identical in its provisions, passed the House on Monday, and is now pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

SCHOOL OF FORESTRY IN NORTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 2451) granting to the State of North Dakota 30,000 acres of land to aid in the maintenance of a school of forestry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from New Jersey, the report will be read.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that it will be unnecessary to read all of the report.

Mr. KEAN. Then let the Senator make a statement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was going to suggest that.

Mr. KEAN. Yes; let the Senator from North Dakota explain it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest that the first paragraph at the top of page 2 of the report be read, as it contains the information the Senator probably desires to have.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I suggest that brevity will be secured if the Senator will simply explain it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think it would be impossible to make a better explanation in as short a space than is made in the paragraph I have indicated.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the following extract from the report submitted by Mr. HANSBROUGH January 24, 1906:

By the act to provide for the division of Dakota into two States and to enable the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington to form constitutions and State governments and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to make donations of public lands to such States (chap. 180, 25 Stat. L.), there were granted to the State of North Dakota, in addition to other lands, 170,000 acres for apportionment for such other educational and charitable purposes other than those therein named. These lands, by a provision in the constitution of North Dakota, were divided as follows: Twenty thousand acres to the hospital for the insane, 40,000 acres for the Soldiers' Home, 30,000 acres for a blind asylum, 40,000 acres for industrial and school of manual training, and 40,000 acres for a scientific school. This exhausted the grant of 170,000 acres and left nothing for the school of forestry, which, by the same constitutional provision, was to be located at some point in McHenry, Ward, Bottineau, or Rolette counties, as might be determined upon by an election to be held for that purpose. At the election held Bottineau, Bottineau County, was selected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF RANGE LIGHTS.

The bill (S. 3416) to prohibit any vessel from anchoring in such manner as to obstruct or interfere with the range lights established in any navigable waters of the United States by the United States Light-House Board was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that it shall be unlawful for any vessel to anchor on the range line of any range lights established by the United States Light-House Board in any navigable waters of the United States, and the master of any vessel so anchoring shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $50.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE AT NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

The bill (S. 3409) for the construction of an able seagoing tug for the Revenue-Cutter Service for New Bedford, Mass., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be constructed an able seagoing tug for the Revenue-Cutter Service, to be stationed at New Bedford, Mass., and appropriates $175,000 for this purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONONGAHELA RIVER (PA.) BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 11045) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania," approved February 21, 1903, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. ANDREWS BAY (FLA.) BRIDGE.

The bill (H. R. 11263) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATIONS ON PUGET SOUND.

The bill (S. 1462) to establish one or more fish-cultural stations on Puget Sound, State of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $50,000 for the establishment of one or more fish-cultural stations on Puget Sound, State of Washington, for the propagation of salmon and other food fishes, including purchase of sites, construction of buildings and ponds, purchase and hire of boats and equipment, and such temporary help as may be required for the construction and operation of the fish-cultural stations, at a suitable point or points to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the number of fish-cultural stations to be determined by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. KEAN. The bill seems to be a little unusual. It provides for one or more stations. It is usual to establish one station. There may be a report accompanying the bill. I have nothing to urge against the bill, of course, and would be very glad to have the fish-cultural stations established. I like to see the salmon fisheries of the Pacific coast improved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, submitted by Mr. HOPKINS on the 25th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1462) providing for the establishment of one or more fish-cultural stations on Puget Sound, State of Washington, have examined the same and recommend that the bill pass without amendment.

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to whom the Committee on Fisheries referred the bill for investigation, under date of January 25, 1906, recommended the passage of the bill in question.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORT OF SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

The bill (S. 3263) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a port of delivery at Salt Lake City, Utah," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "hundred" to strike out "eight" and insert "five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an act entitled "An act to establish a port of delivery at Salt Lake City, Utah," approved March 18, 1904, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs to reside at said port, whose salary shall be $1,500 per annum, in lieu of all fees and commissions of every kind whatsoever."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOG SIGNAL AT HUMBOLDT BAY, CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 2274) to establish a fog signal on one of the jetties at the entrance to the harbor at Humboldt Bay, California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that there shall be established on one of the jetties at the entrance to the harbor at Humboldt Bay, California, a fog signal, at a cost not to exceed $15,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely rose to make an inquiry. Is this the last of the bills establishing light-houses or fog signals on the Pacific coast?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it is, until others have been introduced and reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAM IN COFFEE COUNTY, ALA.

The bill (H. R. 7085) authorizing the Pea River Power Company to erect a dam in Coffee County, Ala., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN WYOMING.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator from Wyoming if the bill he wishes to call up does not provoke debate.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 609) to establish a fish-hatching and fish station in the State of Wyoming.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Fisheries with an amendment, at the end of the bill to strike out the words "United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries" and insert the words "Secretary of Commerce and Labor;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Wyoming, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Wyoming."

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] for a moment, if I may have it.

The Senator from Georgia yesterday asked the very proper question as to whether any of the countries of the world grant subsidies or governmental help in any way to cargo ships. I said offhand to the Senator that I was sure France did it, and I thought other countries did the same thing. The Senator requested me to look the matter up and make a statement concerning it, which I am now prepared to do.

Mr. BACON. In order that the Senator may not be interrupted by me, and in order that he may direct his reply particularly to the request which I made, I desire to say that my inquiry went a little further than that now indicated by the Senator.

As I understand the pending bill, it proposes that there shall be $5 a ton paid per annum to each vessel engaged in the foreign trade, without any other limitation or stipulation; in other words, that the sole requirement is that the vessel shall be engaged in foreign trade, and the sole question when so engaged is that it shall have been engaged for one year. Then there are other provisions as to fractional parts of the year; but, speaking generally, the bill has reference to an annual payment of $5 per ton.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Therefore I hope the Senator in giving us the information will so shape it that we may know specifically whether the bounty or subsidy paid by other nations is one upon those two conditions alone or whether it has any reference to the question of the opening of trade in particular directions or as to the speed or number of miles. As I understand the pending bill, it has no reference whatever to the number of miles or to the particular countries to which the vessels would go.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is possible, Mr. President, that I may not be able to specifically answer the inquiry of the Senator on the latter point, but in a general way I can do so.

I find that in addition to France, Japan, Italy, and Austria all grant subsidies to all cargo vessels engaged in foreign commerce, in addition to giving subsidies to their mail lines. It is a significant fact, Mr. President, that France had only two lines of cargo steamers before she adopted this policy, while now she has an enormous tonnage engaged in that business.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Of course the Senator is speaking loud enough, but I really do not catch what he says on account of the hum of conversation in the Chamber.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will repeat it, Mr. President. In addition to France, I find that Japan, Italy, and Austria all grant subsidies to the cargo vessels engaged in foreign commerce, and in addition they give subsidies to their mail lines. I observed, furthermore, that my investigations lead me to the conclusion that prior to granting these subsidies to the French cargo vessels they had only two lines of cargo steamers, while now they have a very heavy tonnage engaged in that business.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator inform us what the tonnage of France now is and what the amount of the increase has been?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will turn to this little document, which I had printed for the information of the Senate, he will find that very definitely stated. It is Senate Document No. 141 of this session. I feel very sure that it is in that document. If it is not, I will get the information for the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; except that I should like to conclude my statement. It will take but a moment.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. Germany does not give subsidies or subventions directly to her cargo ships, but in an indirect way she accomplished that same purpose. As an illustration, Germany hauls at cost all material on the German railways that are intended for shipbuilding, and of course that applies to the so-called cargo vessels as well as to those engaged in transporting the mails.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, will the Senator please return to the matter of the subsidy given by the French Government? Because I want to have a little more definite information in regard to that matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was going to make an additional statement concerning it.

Mr. BACON. I thought the Senator had passed from the French subsidy, and that is the reason why I interrupted him. I will not interrupt him further at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was going to return to that. In very many ways there are preferential rates allowed on shipbuilding material in Germany. That goes to help the shipbuilding industry, and of course it will help the cargo carriers as well as the faster ships. As to the Senator's point—he urged it the other day with a good deal of force. I tried to make a reply to it by saying that the cargo carriers we have provided for in the bill are practically a homogeneous class; that their rates of speed are not very different, the minimum, perhaps, being 10 knots and the maximum 13 knots. So they are a homogeneous class, and the matter of paying them by the mile would not be different to one steamer from what it would be to another.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator refer to the class known generally as "tramps?"

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. I have not had time to examine critically into the matter whether any of the other governments do pay by the ton or not. I think I am correct in saying that in some instances they are required to make some speed. I think so, and yet I am not positive on that point.

Mr. FRYE. Sailing vessels, of course, could not be required to make speed.

Mr. GALLINGER. As the Senator from Maine suggests, they could not require speed of sailing vessels. That is a well-recognized principle and fact.

Mr. BACON. Sailing vessels cut very little figure in the equation now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope they will cut something of a figure in our commerce, if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking generally of the commerce of the world; it is carried by steamships.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true as a rule. The point I wanted to emphasize, and the only point I cared to make at this time, was that the proposed subvention to cargo carriers is not a violent departure from the custom of the maritime nations of the world. England does not subsidize her cargo carriers, and Germany only in an indirect way, but most of the other maritime governments do give subventions to vessels of that class.

That, Mr. President, is all I care to say on that point. I will look the matter up further.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the Senator for the information; and as he is promising to give us additional information I wish to direct his attention to the definite and specific points which I think it is important we should know. Of course the matter as to what is done by other nations is only valuable to us as an evidence of what is considered good policy by others. It may or may not be good policy for ourselves. The distinction I wish to call the attention of the Senator to, as the one upon which I should like to have the information, is not simply met by the term "cargo carrier." I desire the information as to whether or not these other governments ignore what is to my mind an important feature in this matter, and that is, the opening of trade between this country and other countries where we now have little or no trade, and between which countries and our country we now have no direct lines of communication.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I can answer the Senator on that point by saying that I do not think their cargo-carrier ships are required to run from one port to another. Their mail lines are required to do that.

Mr. BACON. Exactly; but I wanted, if the Senator could secure the information, something definite upon that line in order that we might be informed whether it is true that the governments which are cited as governments which subsidize their vessels are indifferent to that particular feature, which I regard as the most important feature, or whether it is, in fact, true that while they do give subsidies to cargo carriers, they, in a greater or less degree, endeavor to guard and promote particular lines of communication where their development is deemed important and where their want of development is now the cause of the interest manifested and the effort made to remedy it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it goes without saying, Mr. President, that it would be impossible for any country to require a cargo ship to obtain cargo at a given port and carry it to another given port. That could not be done, I take it.

Mr. BACON. Then, that brings the matter to what I consider to be a somewhat definite proposition, that the Senator regards the cargo subsidy as one which will not meet the requirement or the desire for the development of trade on lines of communication between any given points.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I regard it differently from that. I consider it very desirable that our own merchandise should be conveyed in our own ships. The American people, so far as the testimony taken by the Merchant Marine Commission is concerned—I will say the business men and manufacturers—do regard that as a very important matter. I regard it myself as important that we should encourage these cargo carriers, sail ships as well as steam, for the purpose of training seamen. I think that a very important consideration.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstood my last remark, Mr. President. I was not speaking at that particular time of the question whether or not the cargo carrier was important. I understood the reply of the Senator to be directed to that inquiry, which I did not make. The inquiry I made of the Senator was this: I asked him if, in view of what he had said as to the impracticability of subsidizing cargo carriers between certain points, the conclusion was not a proper one that if the country has in view the development of trade between certain points or the establishment of lines of ships, either steamships or sailing vessels, between certain points, the subsidizing of the general cargo carrier is not the way to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, by and large, I would agree with the Senator in that proposition; but the Senator will note that in this bill we have suggested the establishment of ten or eleven lines of faster steamships, to go to countries where we have very little trade now, for that very purpose.

Mr. BACON. I understand that; and, as I suggested to the Senator yesterday, I am very much in sympathy with that particular part of his bill; but I want to differentiate the two things, in order that it may be clearly understood what it is hoped to accomplish by the two different propositions, the two different schemes. The two different schemes, as I understand, in this bill are, first, the scheme of the general cargo carrier, by which any ship engaged in foreign trade, regardless of what port it goes to or the number of miles it may traverse in going there, shall be paid $5 per ton per annum; and the other is a proposition to establish some ten or twelve different lines of steamships, so far as that their establishment can be secured by the encouragement of giving liberal compensation for carrying the mails. The particular point upon which I wish to get the views of the Senator—because he has given this matter very careful thought and his view is very much more valuable than any suggestions I might make—is this: Before stating that, however, I will say that my object for desiring his plain statement in this particular upon the proposition is that what he now states, or what I now understand him to state, entirely agrees with my own opinion. I wish to have it made plain and to have it emphasized that in the one case the proposition to subsidize cargo ships is for the general encouragement of the building of ships and for the training of seamen, and for the additional purpose of providing for, or it may be of having, our foreign trade carried in American vessels rather than in foreign vessels; but that that particular proposition is not the one upon which there is reliance for the development of trade between our own country and particular countries with which we now have either no trade at all, or, if any trade, only an insignificant trade, and that that is not to be relied upon for the purpose of establishing lines of either steamships or sailing vessels between this country and those countries with which we have that lack of trade and lack of direct communication; but that the purpose to accomplish that latter end is the one which influenced the other provision of the bill where certain lines of ships are provided for, and large compensation provided for mails, in order that shipowners may be encouraged to put lines of steamships on those particular lines.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I deem the latter proposition as an extremely important one. I believe that the entire American people recognize the fact that it is of the utmost importance that we should have direct communication with countries where we now do not have direct communication, and that avenues of trade should be opened between this country and those countries for the purpose of the development of that trade and for the furnishing of a market to our own products in countries which now get those products from other countries. For instance, the countries which I have more particularly in mind and which I presume are more particularly in the minds of the people at large are the countries of South America with which we have now no direct communication to speak of; in fact, I do not know that we have any direct lines of steamships between this country and the main ports of South America and the ports of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Only to Venezuela and the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. BACON. But so far as Rio Janeiro and Buenos Ayres and other important South American ports are concerned we have none. Those are the great ports with which we desire to build up trade. If I am correctly informed, not only passengers, but freight going to those ports have first to go to England and then across the Atlantic the second time to get there.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is correct.

Mr. BACON. That is a very deplorable condition, and I recognize the fact that it is one which calls for very grave consideration on the part of the United States Government and for such proper encouragement as can be given within the limits of direct encouragement and assistance in liberal compensation for carrying the mails which would bring about those desirable ends.

For that reason I state to the Senator that I am very much in sympathy with that part of the bill; and while I do not wish to be committed finally to the support of that part of it without further examination of details, I am very much inclined to think that I should vote for so much of the bill as is limited to the giving of liberal mail compensation to proposed lines of steamships which are to be engaged in trade between the ports of the United States and ports of other countries, but especially those of South America where we now have no trade and no lines of communication, and where it is so important that we establish and develop such trade.

I think that the Senator would accomplish very much better an important part of what he has in view if the bill should be limited to the latter design, as is expressed in the fifth and sixth sections of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GALLINGER. In a moment, Mr. President. I think it is proper before yielding that I should make a brief statement. As some other Senators have signified their purpose of discussing the bill to-day, I do not wish to occupy more time than is absolutely necessary. I rose simply to make a brief rejoinder to the interrogatory of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and then I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. SPOONER. I will take but a moment, Mr. President. This bill is a very great improvement upon any bill of the kind with which I have become at all familiar. I do not expect universal concurrence in that proposition, and I know I shall not get it. But there is one phase of the bill concerning which I should like to briefly interrogate the Senator who has it in charge. The bill provides—of course it is indefinite in its operations, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] said yesterday—that annual contracts are to be made, and also provides that no one ship shall receive this subvention for a longer period than ten years. Do I state that correctly?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is correct.

Mr. SPOONER. That leads me to ask the Senator what is the average life of a ship which would fall within the classes to be aided by this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think about twenty years. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] can answer that more intelligently than I.

Mr. SPOONER. My recollection is that the Senator from Maine stated in the debate on the former subsidy bill that twenty years was the average life of such a ship. Now, if that be true, this is what troubles me about the bill: There will be ten years in the life of a ship during which it will receive no subvention. Can it be operated during that time in competition with other ships which do receive subventions?

Mr. GALLINGER. It may go into the coastwise trade after that.

Mr. SPOONER. It may; but suppose this develops very rapidly a fleet of ocean-going ships, as it may do?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, if shipowners take this subvention, they understand what the terms of the contract are, and will have to take their chances after the ten years.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it a fair proposition to fix that limit? If I have one new seagoing ship, I would be entitled under the provisions of this bill to this subvention.

Mr. GALLINGER. For ten years.

Mr. SPOONER. For ten years. I might be induced to duplicate my ship, and I would be entitled to this subvention for ten years on that ship.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Then at the expiration of ten years, when those two ships are brought into competition with ships which are receiving this subsidy, would not that be an impossible competition?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, it might under similar conditions. But the Senator will remember that there is an annual deterioration in ships; and I do not think the Government wants to give subventions to broken-down ships. A ship which has sailed for ten years is a second-hand ship.

Mr. SPOONER. But it may be a seaworthy ship.

Mr. GALLINGER. It may be seaworthy, but it may not be in condition to perform satisfactory service, although it may float.

Mr. FRYE. Does not the bill require that ships to receive subsidies at all shall be A1?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Then, at the end of ten years, if a ship still be A1, it will receive the subsidy?

Mr. SPOONER. But a ship may be kept A1 at the end of ten years or at the end of fifteen years, or possibly at the end of twenty years. Is the theory right? Ought that limit to be in the bill? Is it not put there to avert criticism of the bill because of its breadth and generosity rather than to do justice?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I think not. I will be frank with the Senator and say that no such thought as that was in my mind. It seemed to the framers of the bill—and I take very little credit in the matter—that we ought to have first-class ships and that we ought not to be giving subventions to old hulks.

Mr. SPOONER. Is not an A1 ship a first-class ship? It may have been rebuilt practically a half dozen times.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, why should they not have the subvention, if they keep their ships A1? The result of it would be, it seems to me, that a man who has two such ships, at the expiration of ten years will be obliged to go out of competition with subsidized ships, and to sell his ships to the company which has a great mass of ships and which can control the business and fix the price at such a rate that his ships would be useless.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, there is something in the Senator's contention that is worthy of very serious consideration. I notice the varying objections that are raised to this bill. Some Senators denounce shipbuilding as a trust which should not receive any consideration, while other Senators are disturbed because this bill does not go far enough.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not doing that.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; the Senator is anxious for shipbuilders to get every possible consideration. Now, I take it that if this bill should become a law and the shipbuilders should do what they say they are willing to do—put their ships into commission and build new ships—they, understanding the conditions in this bill, must take their chances; but very likely the bill can be amended in such a way as to make it a better bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not opposing the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that.

Mr. SPOONER. But I want to call the attention of the Senator solemnly to what seems to me to be possibly a very serious defect in the scheme.

One thing in favor of this bill is the universality of its operation. It is a promise or an offer to every man in the United States who will build and put upon the sea a ship fit to engage in foreign commerce; but will it encourage men of small means, relatively, to build one ship or two ships of the burthen necessary to engage in foreign commerce, if they know that at the expiration of ten years those ships will no longer receive this aid; will no longer be helped by the Government to equalize the difference in the cost of operation—33 per cent, and not greatly to be diminished, all concede—but will be brought into competition with subsidized ships? A man would have to give away his ship when the subsidy ceases to be paid. Will it not be an inevitable result of that provision in the bill that ships will not be built, except by the great lines? There will be no encouragement to the great mass of men who wish, in a small way relatively, to make shipping their business.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to any Senator.

Mr. FRYE. Would not an amendment that the contracts be made so long as the ships were rated A1 answer the Senator's objection?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; that is another thing.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Maine will speak so that we can hear him.

Mr. FRYE. He generally does, I guess.

Mr. BACON. Yes, but the Senator is speaking with his back toward us.

Mr. FRYE. I asked if the bill were so amended as to allow these contracts to be made with ships so long as they were rated A1, would it not satisfy the objection made by the Senator from Wisconsin; and then I was going to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that it seems to me that that is reasonable. I should like to have him take that into consideration before the bill is finally acted upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have invited criticism and suggestions in the way of amendment to the bill. I have no pride of opinion about it. The Senator knows that.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not that. Otherwise it is to me as certain as that the sun will come up in the morning that the operation of this bill would encourage the construction of ships by corporations of great capital and discourage the construction of ships by men of comparatively small means, who can own but one ship or two ships. One great advantage of this bill is, as the whole theory of it contemplates, that it is open to everybody.

Now, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] says, if this subsidy is paid so long as the Government officials class a ship as an A1 ship—and that was the provision, as I remember it, in the Hanna-Frye bill—then that difficulty is avoided. I commend the suggestion to the prayerful consideration of my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will have very careful consideration.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Wisconsin said "prayerful consideration."

Mr. GALLINGER. It shall have "prayerful" as well as careful consideration.

A single word, Mr. President, in reference to the cargo vessels, and then I will yield to other Senators who desire to speak. I will not indulge in any lengthy remarks, because the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is prepared to proceed with the discussion of this bill.

It would be a rash man who would flatter himself that any bill on this or any allied subject could be framed that would obviate all objections. One of the chief objections that was urged, and persistently urged, against the bill which the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. FRYE] had before the Senate a few years ago was that it did not take care of these cargo carriers; that it was a bill in the interest of the swift steamships. I confess that, acting in conjunction with my associates on the Merchant Marine Commission, we have given a great deal of consideration to the matter of providing for the cargo carriers, and we thought the provision in the bill for their benefit a very desirable one, and in that respect an improvement over the bill of the Senator from Maine. Of course the Senator does not agree to that, but we felt that way, and I do not expect that provision will be stricken from the bill; at least, I hope not.

I have been flattering myself with the hope that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] will not only find his way clear to vote for the latter part of the bill, but for the bill as a whole, because there is a great deal of interest in this bill in his own State.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that I propose to emphasize my opposition to the first part of the bill by moving to strike it out.

Mr. GALLINGER. I expected that. Now, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] desires to speak on the bill, and I yield to him.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, were it not for the fact that the chairman of the Merchant Marine Commission, having this bill in charge upon the floor of the Senate, has informed me that he is not yet ready to ask the Senate to vote upon the measure, in consequence of the fact that he has under consideration certain amendments which have been suggested during this discussion, I would gladly forego this opportunity to make any remarks upon the bill, because I can not but feel that almost all that is possible has been said on each side of this controversy, and the question has settled down to an issue between those who would do something, even if it be but to a partial extent, to rehabilitate our merchant marine, and those who would entirely abandon the field to foreign enterprise and activity. And yet, Mr. President, as a member of the Merchant Marine Commission, which sat at many important points on the Atlantic seaboard, upon the Gulf, at the ports on the Great Lakes, and on the Pacific slope, and, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, I have been so deeply impressed with the importance of this question that I do not altogether regret that the delay in coming to a vote upon the measure has given me this opportunity, and more particularly do I have this feeling because there is no section of our great country more vitally interested in the rehabilitation of our merchant marine than the great State which I in part represent in this body.

Upon the shores of the Delaware we should see, were our shipbuilding industry properly protected, a center of shipbuilding activity unequaled at any other point in the world. Upon the shores of that great stream in the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware are combined all the elements which contribute to the shipbuilding industry. There is found, within a reasonable proximity to the ocean, fresh water wherein ships can be repaired or stored, and in the fresh-water basin at the League Island Navy-Yard, at the junction of the Schuylkill and the Delaware, there is an area of water sufficient to store the whole American Navy were it necessary.

Philadelphia, Chester, Camden, and Wilmington are all great cities situated near an unlimited supply of competent, skilled, and unskilled labor and near all the sources of supplies and commodities entering into the construction of a merchant or a battle ship; and yet, Mr. President, I am confronted by the fact that, including all the seagoing steam vessels built in the United States during the year ending December 31, 1905, the total was only eighteen vessels of 35,199 gross tons. In addition to this, during the calendar year 1905, seventeen yachts of 753 gross tons were bulit, but they are hardly worth considering in this connection.

More than one-half of this tonnage is one ship of 20,714 tons, built for James J. Hill's railroad connections at Puget Sound for the line between Japan and China. On the Delaware River, to which I have referred, only 4 steamers, of 5,932 gross tons, were built.

The above statement can well be compared with the output of Great Britain and Ireland during the calendar year 1905. The official figures have not reached me, but the Shipping World, a London publication and a recognized authority on shipping matters abroad, compiles every year from returns furnished by shipbuilders a table showing the construction of the United Kingdom during the past calendar year. This is printed shortly after the 1st of January, in advance of the official figures, and has just been received in this country. The figures are considered entirely trustworthy. They show the output on the Clyde and in Scotland as 407 vessels, of a gross tonnage of 571,287. The shipbuilding firm of Harland & Wolff, of Belfast, Ireland, last year built 9 steamers, of 85,287 gross tons, or more than double the output of seagoing steam tonnage of all our American yards. There were, indeed, six single British shipyards each of which built more seagoing steam tonnage during the last calendar year than was built in the entire United States during the same period.

According to the Shipping World of January 3, 1906, the total output of the different centers of shipbuilding in the United Kingdom for 1905 was as follows:

	Number.	Tons.
The Clyde and Scotland	407	571,287
The Tyne	135	322,749
The Wear	101	316,940
The Hartlepools	35	119,517
The Tees	40	132,751
The Humber	108	29,497
The Thames	138	12,338
The Channel and West Coast	192	48,270
Ireland	35	144,743
Total	1,191	1,698,152

The report of the Commissioner of Navigation shows, on pages 10 to 13, the steel vessels under construction or under contract at the beginning of the fiscal year July 1, 1905. At that date there were 49 seagoing merchant steel vessels, of 86,836 gross tons, under construction or under contract. Some of these have since been completed, and the work under contract on some of the others is probably not yet any further than the assembling of materials.

No similar tables are at hand of foreign vessels under construction at the same time. In the United Kingdom, according to Lloyd's statement for the world of vessels under construction on September 30, 1905, there were 474 vessels, of 1,325,328 gross tons, under construction. It will be noted that this return of Lloyds shows only 26 seagoing vessels, of 38,474 gross tons, under construction in the United States, of which 12 vessels, of 24,824 gross tons, were under construction on the Delaware. Lloyd's figures are a slight underestimate for the United States. The Cramps, for example, are building four steamers for the New York and Cuba Mail Line (two of which are to replace vessels they sold to the Panama Canal Commission), aggregating about 28,000 tons. These were not contracted for until August, and therefore were not covered by Lloyds' return, which allows only 24,824 under construction on the Delaware.

Making allowances for differences due to the fact that there are included in these figures contracts for ships as well as for ships the keels of which have been actually laid and for the fact that the ships covered in the table for July 1, 1905, by this time are either completed or in some instances very close to completion, the Lloyds tables are a fair statement of the construction for the ocean trade in progress in American and foreign yards.

Mr. President, Pennsylvania as a State and Philadelphia and Chester as shipbuilding cities are intensely interested in the success of this effort to revive the American merchant marine in ocean commerce. No people have suffered worse than theirs from its long decline. No people are more familiar with the causes that have brought this paralysis upon our shipping trade, and none will more gratefully applaud the first promise of its restoration.

Pennsylvania ship owners and builders are men of splendid courage and tenacity. When, after the civil war, they found their Government protecting everything and everybody else and forgetting them, they did not haul down their flag and quit the sea without a struggle.

A BRAVE TRIAL.

In 1872–73 a resolute company of Philadelphia business men, including some steamship managers of very great ability and long experience, built four large ocean steamers in the Cramp yard of excellent American iron, and put them into the North Atlantic trade to Liverpool. These noble steamers bore the characteristic American names of Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois. They were among the largest, swiftest, and most efficient passenger and cargo steamers that had thus far been constructed, superior in size, speed, and seaworthiness to their competitors of the foreign lines to Europe.

They proved to be favorite ships with passengers and merchants. Indeed, they were regarded as the proudest vessels of their day. President Grant sailed in one of these American liners on the first voyage of his long journey around the world. The four ships performed a constant service for many years from Philadelphia and New York to Liverpool and Antwerp, and all four are still afloat at an age when nearly all of their foreign rivals have been worn out and abandoned.

A SPLENDID RECORD.

The American Line operating these ships never lost a ship or a passenger, or so much as a mail bag—a record for safety and regularity unmatched in the whole record of trans-Atlantic navigation.

Yet, this American Line, though undoubtedly the best managed beneath any flag, was never profitable to its owners, and they built no more American ships. They had made a thorough trial, and had proved that an American steamship line, unsubsidized, could not maintain itself against subsidized British competition. And there was another handicap besides subsidies—the higher American wages and cost of maintenance.

President Cleveland in his first Administration sent a New England shipmaster, a Democrat of course and also an earnest free trader, to be our consul at Liverpool. Captain Russell made a careful investigation of shipping conditions at the great English port and reported to the State Department that he found the American steamships from Philadelphia paying their officers and crews wages 37 per cent higher than were paid on British ships of the same class in the same trade and supplying them with food so much superior in quality and variety that the cost of maintenance was 27 per cent greater.

The higher wages of American factories are protected by the tariff, but there is no protection for American ships in over-seas commerce. This Philadelphia company had tried patiently and bravely to sail American ships under the American flag on the North Atlantic. They could not meet the double handicap of foreign wages and foreign subsidies, and the United States Government would give them no subsidy whatever for carrying the mails. The result was inevitable. When a little later another Philadelphia company, the International, was formed, it built its steamers in England, in yards developed by the mail subsidies there, and, easily procuring a subsidy from the Belgian Government, flew the Belgian flag over its American-owned ships.

ONLY TEN TRANSATLANTIC SHIPS.

For twenty years after 1873 no trans-Atlantic steamers were launched on the Delaware River. Lacking protection, this industry was dead. Ten years ago the St. Louis and St. Paul were constructed at the Cramp shipyard to run under the postal-subsidy law of 1891, and four other trans-Atlantic steamers have since been built on the Delaware. Thus, ten trans-Atlantic steamships in thirty years—only ten in a generation—is the record of the greatest shipbuilding center in America. While the Delaware has launched ten, the Clyde has launched hundreds.

This is the humiliating record of our one unprotected industry. It can not be charged up to the steel trust or the high price of materials, for during half of this time iron and steel and everything else required for the construction, equipment, or repair of vessels for the foreign trade or for foreign account and ownership have been on the tariff-free list.

Mr. Edwin S. Cramp, vice-president of the William Cramp & Sons Ship and Engine Building Company, states in a letter to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], chairman of the Merchant Marine Commission, that the price of the steel shapes and plates of each of four West India steamers now building in his yard—building for one of our few mail-subsidized companies—is only $11,208 greater than if the material had been purchased abroad—only $11,208 for a vessel costing complete about $900,000, or a little more than 1 per cent.

Whatever difference in the cost of ocean ships there is now between this country and Europe is due almost entirely to labor. Will you cut American labor down? And if you will not cut it down, will you not protect it in the shipyards and on shipboard as you protect it in your factories?

TIME FOR A CHANGE.

Nearly two years of careful inquiry by the Merchant Marine Commission have proved to the satisfaction of all of the members of the Commission that American shipping in ocean trade can not revive without some form of national encouragement, and to the satisfaction of the majority of the Commission that the best form of national encouragement, indeed, the only feasible form, is a carefully guarded subsidy or subvention such as is proposed for both mail steamers and cargo vessels in the present bill. No opposition to this measure can be very impressive or convincing which contents itself with mere picking at details, with negation and objection.

We have waited forty years for our ocean shipping to revive without protection, only to see our tonnage shrink to one-third of that of 1861. The case has become desperate, and those who do not like the remedy the Merchant Marine Commission offers must bestir themselves to get something better if they can. This is no time for fault-finding. We have debated and theorized and scolded long enough. What is needed now is action, immediate and positive.

A BENEFIT TO THE WHOLE NATION.

The enactment of this bill will be of very large direct and indirect benefit to Pennsylvania, greatest of our ocean shipbuilding States and greatest manufacturer of steel and iron. But it will be of very large advantage also to the States of the South, whose numerous harbors and resources in timber, ore, and coal give them a fair chance in competition with Pennsylvania. It will be of great advantage to the Western States that feed our wage-earners from the products of their farms and supply a large part of the shipyard materials.

The building of a new fleet of American ocean ships will enhance the value of every acre of timber land or iron land on Lake Superior. It will mean more business for the lumbermen and miners and more business for the farmers of the great grain and cattle regions to keep the new ships filled with cargoes after they are launched.

For four years up to last winter no order had been given to any Delaware shipyard, or, indeed, to any shipyard in America, for a steamship for overseas trade. Even now the four new Ward Line steamers in the Cramp yard are the only ships building anywhere in the country exclusively for foreign commerce. In the midst of the highest prosperity in all other industries ocean shipbuilding has been almost dead and one-half of our skilled shipyard mechanics idle or employed at rough and unskilled common labor.

TO SAVE OUR SHIPYARDS.

We have in America some of the greatest and best shipyards in the world, managed by men of the most advanced technical attainments, and equipped to build the best merchant marine, as they have built the best navy, that ever floated. But hereafter these yards can not hope for full and constant employment in the construction of battle ships, for we have launched a strong fleet and the need now is only for a moderate increase. If the great shipyards of America are to live and prosper hereafter, it must be chiefly by the building and repair of merchant ships. The very existence of these shipyards, with their thousands of stockholders, their tens of thousands of workmen, and all the trades and industries in many States that contribute to the completed ship, hangs upon the enactment of this legislation.

It is in the power of the Senate by its vote upon this bill to determine whether American ocean shipbuilding shall live—whether it at last shall have protection and shall grow and prosper as has every other American industry—or whether it shall wither and vanish until our flag at sea away from our own coasts shall vanish also, save as borne by some chance yacht or man-of-war.

It is true that some millions of dollars of American money are invested in steamships under foreign colors. But one thing must be borne in mind, and that is that the mere passage of a free-ship law would not bring this American-owned foreign shipping beneath the flag of the United States. A year ago the Merchant Marine Commission caused a special inquiry to be sent to the principal American owners of foreign steamship property—to the International Mercantile Marine Company, W. R. Grace & Co., the Anglo-American Oil Company, and others. These concerns were asked the direct question whether they would hoist the American flag above their ships if American registry were given them by act of Congress. One and all replied that they would not do this; that a free-ship law would be absolutely null and void; that they could not afford to accept American registry unless some offset were provided through subsidy, discriminating duty, or otherwise for the higher range of wages of American officers and crews and the higher standard of maintenance of American vessels.

Indeed, there are acts of Congress now granting registry to foreign steamships which have never been availed of by the owners to whom American registry was offered. They sought this registry, but on consideration preferred to continue to run beneath foreign flags.

The case is exactly parallel to American ownership of foreign factories employing labor at low wages on goods intended for use in the United States. If American investors in these foreign factories were allowed by act of Congress to transfer their whole machinery and equipment free of duty to this country, they would not do this unless they could have some protection or encouragement by tariff to enable them to offset the higher labor cost of operation in America.

This inquiry of the Merchant Marine Commission therefore has demonstrated that a free-ship law would have absolutely no effect, in the judgment of American investors, in foreign shipping. They would not bring their foreign vessels under the American flag if they were given an opportunity unless, indeed, a subsidy or discriminating duty compensated them for the higher wages they would have to pay and the better food they would have to provide for American officers and for seamen shipped in American ports.

There are those who contend that it is sufficient that American capital invested in foreign shipping in our carrying trade brings dividends from its investment to America. That, of course, is all right from the standpoint of the capitalist. He gets his money out of his foreign shipping. It comes into this country. It is spent at home. To that extent the country is the gainer.

But where does the American wage-earner come in? Where is the benefit to him of American investment in foreign shipping? For it is a well-known fact that these foreign steamship lines, even when owned and controlled by American capital, build their ships abroad, repair them abroad, supply them abroad, and employ no American labor whatsoever, except the rough cargo handlers on our city docks.

There was a time when American officers and sailors, driven out of our disappearing wooden sailing ships, were to be found in considerable numbers on the decks of ships of foreign nations. But that time has passed. These officers and men themselves have disappeared. The ships which cross and recross the North Atlantic, flying foreign colors and carrying our mails and freight and passengers, are officered and manned now exclusively by foreigners.

DESTITUTE ABROAD.

They carry their boycott of all things American—except American dollars—so far that they will not employ American seamen except to take the places of chance deserters in our ports. Thus this passage in a recent newspaper is significant:

ANTWERP, December 3, 1905.

Numbers of American sailors who are shipped on board foreign vessels in American ports are discharged on their arrival in Europe. They are unable to obtain return engagements on account of the prejudices of foreign owners and the local authorities can not assist in their relief. As a consequence many of these sailors are now destitute in every port. For the relief of these sailors the American colony yesterday gave a gala performance under the patronage of the American and British consuls.

Is this a thing to be proud of—that the few American sailors who gain employment on foreign ships are turned adrift abroad to become objects of charity in foreign countries? Meanwhile the millions of American money invested in foreign shipping are training foreign sailors as a naval reserve for foreign governments, our rivals in trade and possible enemies in war.

Secretary Taft and the General Staff of the Army declare that because of the shrinkage of our merchant shipping so few steamers fit for transports are available that—

Now and for the immediate future the force for which our military establishment is maintained can not be exerted oversea. The quick first blow, so very and increasingly important, can not be struck at all, nor can an expedition of any greater size be embarked without delay except by the use of foreign vessels.

And the War Department report adds:

These conditions can not improve until the American steam seagoing merchant marine has increased in general to approximately two and one-half its present volume by the addition of ships adapted in size and design to quick conversion into suitable transports and built under conditions which make their voluntary surrender to the United States on demand a foregone conclusion.

American capital invested in American shipping would not only mean employment for American shipyard employees, but would mean, too, the creation of an adequate fleet of transports, supply ships, colliers, and other naval auxiliaries for the United States instead of for the governments of Europe. A large part of the $200,000,000 paid to foreign shipowners every year for the carrying of our foreign commerce is in effect a contribution to the war power of Europe. Great Britain has more than 30,000 of her merchant seamen, most of them employed in the North Atlantic trade, enrolled by the admiralty for naval service.

Germany, France, Italy, and the other powers of the Continent regard every merchant officer and seaman as a naval-reserve man and subject their seafaring population to a period of regular naval service. After this officer or man has received his naval training and becomes useful to his Government, he goes on board a merchant ship engaged in carrying American commerce and is thereafter maintained at our expense.

SHIPS OF OUR OWN.

A large part, therefore, of the cost of European preparation for war with the United States or any other country comes indirectly but none the less surely out of the pockets of the American people. We are paying the bills of the prepared and powerful naval reserves of Europe. Meanwhile we have almost no naval reserve of our own. Our naval fleet is almost the only one in the world, with the exception of that of Russia and China perhaps, which has no second line—no sea militia—behind it. And we can never have such a second line, such a sea militia, so long as nine-tenths of our foreign commerce is conveyed by foreign ships, even if 10 or 12 per cent of these foreign ships are owned by American capital.

This bill of the Merchant Marine Commission will give us ships of our own—American built, and manned by American officers and seamen. It will not give us floating palaces. There is nothing in this legislation to insure the launching of "greyhounds" that will cross the sea in five days. It is not primarily a bill for fast trans-Atlantic navigation. It aims rather to encourage the creation of steam lines of moderate speed and great carrying power to South America, Africa, and Asia. These are the substantial and useful ships of commerce. They are the ships which the United States needs most, the ships which will best serve our ends, and in peace and in war will be valuable as auxiliaries to our fighting squadrons, for the modern navy, while it requires swift scouts from the merchant fleet, must have also all manner of attendant vessels—ships to convey reserve ammunition, coal, and supplies of all kinds, and hospital ships and repair ships also. These need not be of extraordinary speed. The War Department and the Navy Department both state that from 12 to 15 knots is sufficient. These are the ships that would be produced for our new American lines to South America, Africa, and Asia.

American capital invested in such tonnage would give employment to American labor from the very time the keel is laid. Indeed, more than that, it would give employment to American labor from the shipyard back to the rolling mill and forge, to the foundry, mine, and forest; for 95 per cent of the cost of a finished steamship is labor, after all—not labor in the shipyard alone, but labor in all the workshops where the plates and beams are wrought, labor in the mines whence the coal and ore are dug, labor in the forests where the timber is felled, and the mills where it is fashioned. A great shipbuilding industry in America means new markets for the products of our farms. A thousand more workmen in a shipyard on the Delaware, on the shores of Virginia or Georgia or the Gulf States means three or four thousand more to be fed and clothed, and to build the merchant marine made possible by this bill would mean, not a thousand more workmen, but tens of thousands all along the coast of the United States.

SHIPS MAKE MORE TRADE.

Yet the prime end we have in view is, after all, not shipbuilding or ship owning or navigation, or even the strengthening of the Navy by a great body of skilled officers and seamen. The real object of a reestablished merchant marine is the expansion of American commerce. Once build your ships and trade is sure to follow in their wake, as cities and towns spring up along the lines of our transcontinental railroads. Ships work for the ports that own them just as railroads work for their terminal points. The great ocean steamer built in Pennsylvania out of Lake Superior ore increases the value of Iowa and Dakota farms through the new transportation facilities she provides and the new power she gives for driving American merchandise into the markets of South America or the Orient.

It is an old cry against protection to American industry that it takes money from the pockets of the many to put into the pockets of the few. This assertion is a hundred years old in America. It has echoed and reechoed through a hundred political campaigns. It has deceived the unthinking, but it has never stood the test of frank examination and honest inquiry.

This bill will cost the American people something. Its subventions must be paid out of the National Treasury from money collected indirectly from all the people, but the ships which these subventions will give the nation will serve the interests of all the people.

The money which is being used, for instance, to irrigate the arid regions of the West is the money of the many, but it is a shortsighted view that its expenditure benefits only the few landowners of the neighborhood. It is of great advantage to them and of great advantage to the State or Territory in which the land reclaimed by irrigation is located. But this money expended in irrigation benefits the entire country through increasing our arable domain and the productive power of our agriculture.

So the millions that are being spent to strengthen the levees of the Mississippi will save the planters there from inundation, and the millions more that are being spent to make navigable the interior rivers of the country are justifiable, really because, though this money comes from the pockets of the people, the benefits in the long run go to all the people, too, for we are all one people and one country, and the prosperity of Colorado and of Mississippi means in the long run the prosperity of New York and Pennsylvania. And it is just as true that the prosperity of New York and Pennsylvania in the long run means the prosperity of the Southern States that grow cotton and the Western States with their cereals, their cattle, and their fruit.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania meet with my most hearty approval. I believe that no measure which beneficially affects any part of this country can be indifferent in its effects upon any other part of the country.

The region to be reclaimed by the Reclamation Service, for instance, is a region at present unproductive. It is a well-known fact that the American farmer now raises an amount of wheat each year in excess of the demands of home consumption, but as our population increases it has proven unfortunately true that there is not a corresponding increase in the growth of that necessary grain for human food. The wheat-producing properties of the soil of New England, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, and the great belt of Middle States become gradually exhausted.

We now produce in the United States about 600,000,000 bushels of wheat each year, of which we export considerable, probably one-third. Yet the wheat-producing power of the United States is less to-day, particularly in the States formerly relied upon for the production of wheat, than was that power ten to twenty years ago. I well recall that Ohio was once a great wheat-producing State. Its production now is of little consequence in comparison with the total of the country. The State of Illinois was a great wheat-producing State twenty years ago, but experience demonstrated the fact that not to exceed three good crops of wheat could be grown on any acre of land in the State of Illinois in succession. The State of Minnesota became in time one of the banner wheat-growing States of the Union, but the wheat-producing properties of the soil of Minnesota gradually became exhausted and its power to produce wheat consequently diminished. The Dakotas, once regarded as an inexhaustible source of supply for wheat production, have been found to have limitations.

I believe if we were confined now for our wheat supply to those States in the Union upon which the rainfall is adequate for the production of a crop, we would be importing wheat from India inside of twenty years. We will, before the great body of arid lands shall have been reclaimed, find it necessary to draw upon the arid region for the breadstuff of the nation.

Probably 50,000,000 acres of wheat-producing land will be brought under the operations of the Reclamation Service. While the average crop in the State of Minnesota is 12 bushels per acre, the average production upon an acre of irrigated land is from 40 to 60 bushels, or, in other words, 40 acres of land under irrigation will, year in and year out, produce more merchantable wheat than 200 acres of land within the rain belt, so called.

We of that arid region are looking for our market for the enormous quantities of wheat destined to be produced there not to Europe, but to Asia. The largest order for flour ever placed in any milling establishment in the world was recently placed with the Minneapolis mills for flour to be exported to China, notwithstanding the boycott. We are interested in whatsoever will furnish us the means of sending this future product to the markets of the world, and particularly to the oriental market.

A slight scanning of the map will show that the Pacific Ocean is largely bounded now by American territory. On the east are the Pacific coast States; to the west we have the Hawaiian Islands, not quite in midocean, but well-nigh situated in midocean; to the north and the northwest the great Alaskan country, and the Aleutian Islands extending down well-nigh to the coast of Japan; to the southwest the Philippine Archipelago, extending for some 2,000 miles on the southwestern point or border of the Pacific Ocean. Upon all that vast ocean bounded so largely by our territory, with possibilities of commerce which we can now but slightly comprehend, we have but a few American ships transporting passengers and a slight amount of freight from Pacific coast ports up to Alaska, and a very few vessels engaged in trade with the Orient.

A very enterprising American but recently invested in two of the largest freight-carrying vessels now afloat. The vessels are engaged in the trade between Seattle and ports of China and Japan. I am informed that these vessels, splendidly equipped though they be, with tonnage exceeding 20,000, I believe, with means for labor saving never before employed to such a wide extent, must in the nature of things discontinue to operate in that trade, unless the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of its power, shall in some manner or form tend to equalize conditions between these American vessels and their foreign competitors along the same line.

The interior of the country, Mr. President, is not indifferent to the growth of our shipping through and vitalizing of the American mercantile marine. We are not indifferent to the development of the American Navy. Upon the contrary, we are profoundly interested in both of these arms of commerce and national defense.

What we are anxious to know is that the bill now pending shall not be sent forth in such meager terms and under such restrictions as will make it an experimental measure. I shall vote for it. I shall vote for it, believing it to be in the right direction and confidently hoping that those best informed concerning the possibilities of development may not be mistaken as to the efficacy of the measure employed.

It has been suggested that the bill in its present form does not go far enough to insure the object in view. If that be true, the duty of the hour demands that we make the measure adequate to the achievement of the purpose we have to accomplish.

I do not believe there will be any lack of support from the interior of the country upon this subject. We of the Rocky Mountain region are made up of contributions from all the States in the Union. That western region is a region where provincialism can have no abiding place at all. If you want to find the broad, liberal, unrestrained spirit of nationalism, you must go to the section of the country made up, as that western country is, by people from the South and from New England, from the Atlantic and from the Pacific, and from all the countries of Europe.

We desire, Mr. President, that this measure shall furnish an adequate means of accomplishing the purpose it has in view.

We are not unmindful, sir, that the country is one, and that which is beneficial to our section may prove beneficial to all sections. I visited but recently the chief city in the State of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who yesterday afternoon addressed the Senate upon this subject. I found there busy, thriving populous communities, where but a few years ago arid plains, uninhabited and unproductive, were only to be found. Through the aid of the Government, in the interest of American labor and American industry, through encouragement extended and in good faith received, citizens of the country had invested in one Congressional district in the construction of six beet-sugar factories. These beet-sugar factories, I was informed, cost in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 each. They were producing all the sugar required in that section of the country, and some of the surplus was being shipped across the Mississippi.

These beet-sugar factories, taking care of a product of the farm, caused a dense population to spring up and settle round about plains but recently arid and unsettled. Land that was said to have been worth only $2.50 to $5 an acre twenty years ago is now selling, in the vicinity of Denver, Colo., at from $50 to $250 per acre; and sugar at the same time in that section of the country is cheaper than it was before the factories were established under the encouragement of the Government.

That which was done for the beet-sugar industry of the West may, I think, be done for the shipping industries of the country also, if the Government will but assist by putting the shoulders of all the people behind the movement until the movement gets a sufficient impetus.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] yesterday inquired whether ships could be built cheaper hereafter, provided we started the shipbuilding industry in the country. I think that question answers itself in the matter of common experience.

It is not long ago since an ordinary plow cost $30 to $40 with a steel moldboard, and that, too, when wheat was selling at 50 cents a bushel. By virtue of the development of the plow-manufacturing industry in the country a plow which formerly cost $30 to $40 can be bought for $6 or $8 in the market now. A mowing machine which used to cost $125 can be purchased in the market now for from $40 to $60. It is so with wagons, and with the various implements of husbandry.

The development of factories, the increase of demand, the development of skilled labor, the multiplication of manufacturing enterprises will, of course, in shipbuilding, as in all other departments of endeavor, necessarily reduce the cost as productive capacity is increased, and productive capacity will increase where the demand for the finished product increases.

Let the Senators having this bill in charge give us no experimental legislation. Make the bill strong enough now to put our shipowners and operators upon an equal footing with their competitors, and American enterprise and thrift and skill will do what is necessary to bring American shipping up to the standard of our expectations.

I do sincerely trust that before the Senator from Pennsylvania concludes he will give us some assurance of his faith in the adequacy of the pending measure to accomplish the result its framers have in view.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am very glad to have this interruption, which is not exactly an inquiry, as I had expected, but a very clear and very important statement from the distinguished Senator from Montana. I am glad to learn that there exists so much patriotic feeling in his State, so distant from my own, for the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine and the placing of the American flag again upon our ocean highways.

This bill does not come up to the wishes of any of us, perhaps, who are anxious for the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine, but it is the best that can be obtained under present conditions, and it will undoubtedly go a long way toward bringing about the results which we all have so closely at heart.

Did I think that a bill more radical in its provisions, greater in its expenditures, and more extensive in its scope had any chance of passing the American Congress, I for one would gladly assist in framing it and assist in its passage; but we are all conversant with the opposition and the difficulties which this form of legislation has encountered in the past. So the members of the Merchant Marine Commission felt that it was better to be conservative and to get the best we could rather than, by striving after greater and more brilliant results, to perhaps encounter ultimate defeat.

I shall tax the patience of the Senate but a short time longer, but I desire to call attention to a few points before concluding my remarks.

It has already been shown, Mr. President, that the difference in the cost of ship materials between the United States and Europe—or of materials required for ships for the foreign trade—is not a large item in the cost of the completed vessel. It is not the cost of materials, not the protective tariff, which keeps American shipyards idle and empty while foreign yards are crowded with orders, as they have been for many months. The one difficulty, so far as shipbuilding is concerned, is the higher wages of American labor. A few years ago American consuls in the chief shipping countries of Europe procured exact statements of the rates of wages paid to skilled and unskilled workmen in the various European yards. These figures were published in the Consular Reports and republished in the American Economist with a comparative statement of American shipyard wages in the same trades, prepared by Mr. Cramp, the great shipbuilder of Philadelphia. The earnings for a week of fifty-six hours' work of the mechanics and laborers of various classes in the chief shipyards of Great Britain and in the Cramp yard in the United States were as follows:

	British.	American.
Pattern makers	$9.00	$18.00
Machinists	8.50	15.00
Riveters	7.50	12.00
Calkers and chippers	7.80	15.00
Fitters-up	7.80	15.00
Ship carpenters	9.60	18.00
Joiners	9.00	16.50
Painters	9.60	18.00
Furnace men	6.00	10.80
Plumbers	9.60	19.50
Drillers	6.40	11.00
Sheet-iron workers	8.50	15.00
Coppersmiths	8.60	18.00
Molders, iron	9.00	14.50
Molders, brass	9.00	15.00
Laborers	4.20	8.00 to 10.00

This authoritative record shows that the earnings of American workmen in the Cramp shipyard at Philadelphia are nearly twice as great for a given number of hours a week as the earnings of the workmen in the shipyards of Great Britain. But it will be asked are not the American workmen more active and efficient? Unquestionably they are. They are the better men for their higher wages. But they are not so much more active and efficient than their British kinsmen that one man in an American shipyard can do the work of two men abroad.

A 30 PER CENT GREATER COST.

With materials at approximately equal cost, the American ship of a given type and dimensions costs now from 20 to 40 per cent more than a British ship. The average probably is not far from 30 per cent. A year or two ago when the Merchant Marine Commission began its investigation, shipbuilding abroad happened to be stagnant. There was temporarily an oversupply of ships in the world's commerce. Because of that fact, British shipyards were offering to build vessels actually at less than cost in order to keep their machinery employed and to hold their skilled workmen together. Therefore, there were instances reported to the Commission where American shipowners, asking for estimates for the cost of a given vessel in British shipyards and at home, found that British builders would construct a craft for a price not much more than half of that asked by American builders. However, the past year has brought a radical change in conditions. The ending of the war in the East has vastly stimulated oriential commerce and the depression in British shipbuilding has given way to a tremendous boom. The yards of the Clyde and the Tyne are crowded with work. Prices of British ship materials have risen rapidly, and Americans who have lately made inquiries abroad as to the cost of merchant tonnage have found that British prices were again no more than 20 or 30 per cent below prices for similar vessels here. That there is so close a range in the cost of ocean ships in America and Great Britain is proof, of course, that American shipyard labor is more active and efficient. Otherwise, with wages nearly twice as high here as they are in England, the cost of an American ship would be 75 or 80 per cent more than the cost of a similar British vessel.

Acknowledging that American shipyard workmen are more efficient than British workmen and that they actually do more work for their higher wages, the fact remains unmistakable that the superior efficiency of our workmen does not suffice to cover the entire cost of their higher wages. If it did, with ship materials so nearly level in both countries, the price of a completed vessel would be substantially the same here and abroad, and thus British shipowners, who can not procure tonnage from their overcrowded British yards, would place their orders in the empty shipyards of America.

Even allowing for all the higher efficiency of American workmen, there is imperative need of some national protection to equalize conditions between the Delaware River and the Clyde. Such protection is offered in the terms of the proposed bill of the Merchant Marine Commission. It is true that this bill gives no subvention, bounty, or subsidy to shipbuilding. Japan, France, Italy, and other nations give bounties from the public treasury of so much per ton on all native-built ocean ships, and also grant subsidies for navigation. The plan which we recommend is to grant subventions only on the navigation of the ships—to both mail liners and cargo vessels. It is our belief that if this aid is bestowed American shipowners will thereby be enabled to run their ships on even terms against the cheap wages and the subsidies of Europe.

As an illustration of how generously our chief rivals in trade encourage their great lines of mail steamships, this statement from a New York newspaper of a recent date is interesting:

[New York Herald, January 21, 1906.]

SHIP SUBSIDIES ABROAD.

The German lines are the most heavily state-subsidized steamship lines in the world. The total imperial subsidy granted by Germany to steamship lines amounts to $1,737,500 per annum, and is distributed among the North German Lloyd, of Bremen, and the German East Africa Company, of Hamburg. There is in addition to this a small imperial subsidy granted for a service established to compete for the West African trade. The German East Africa line receives $337,500 a year for a fortnightly service circumnavigating Africa in alternate directions. The North German Lloyd receives $825,000 per annum for a fortnightly service direct to China and Japan, and $575,000 for a monthly service to Australia. In addition to this there is an amount of $325,000 paid to the Hamburg-American and North German Lloyd companies for the carriage of mails.

The P. & O. Company receives the sum of $1,750,000 per annum for a fortnightly service from Brindisi to Shanghai, a weekly service from Brindisi to Bombay, and a fortnightly service from Brindisi to Adelaide. Of this sum approximately $425,000 is allotted to the Australian service, Brindisi to Adelaide, covering about 9,100 miles, including ports of call. If 2,500 miles, about the distance from London to Brindisi—the P. & O. is obliged to run to Brindisi to pick up the mails—and 1,075 miles, representing the mileage from Adelaide to Sydney, are added, a total distance of 12,675 miles, the nearest possible approach to an absolutely comparative basis is obtained. The North German Lloyd receives $575,000 per annum for a monthly service from Bremerhaven to Sydney, a distance of about 13,100 miles, including ports of call. The P. & O. Company runs fifty-two voyages in a year, and the North German Lloyd runs, under its contract, at least twenty-six voyages a year. This works out at 66.105 cents per mile for the P. & O. and Orient companies, and $1.68819 per mile for the North German Lloyd.

If the bill proposed by the Merchant Marine Commission is enacted, American shipyards will prosper, though they receive no direct subvention of their own. For the bill requires that to be qualified for these subventions, ships must be already registered or hereafter built and registered in the United States.

Take, for example, the proposed mail lines to South America. There is now not one American steamer running on these important routes. These proposed lines are absolutely nonexistent. And there are few if any steamers now in commission under the flag of the United States that are adapted to the peculiar requirements of this long-voyage trade and of the general commerce of South America. Perhaps there are a few steamers that can be temporarily employed to begin the service while other ships are being constructed. But virtually the entire fleet requisite for these South American lines must be built in American shipyards. That is true to a lesser degree of the proposed lines in the Pacific Ocean, where a few American ships are hard pressed by British, Japanese, and other foreign subsidized competition.

It is estimated that the ten new lines will call, in round numbers, for about sixty ocean steamships, most of them large vessels and capacious carriers of cargo, and that the aggregate tonnage of this new ocean mail fleet will be nearly, if not quite, 300,000 tons. The building of these ships will give employment to our idle shipyards. It will bring work and wages to thousands of mechanics. And with them, alongside of them, will be built also, if this bill is passed, the cargo vessels, steam and sail, especially for West Indian, South American, and Asiatic commerce, which are to receive the subventions provided in sections 2 and 3 of $5 per ton, or $6.50 per ton in Philippine commerce.

WAGES THAT ARE NEEDED.

What this law means to the shipbuilding industry of the United States can be realized when it is said that there are now building, all told, less than 30,000 tons of ocean steamships in the United States—all of this in one shipyard on the Delaware. Except for these four vessels, not one order for an ocean steamship exclusively for foreign trade has been given since June, 1901, to any American builder. Representatives of the shipyard workmen—the Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders, affiliated with the Federation of Labor—who appeared in 1904 before the committees of Congress in support of the recommendation of the President of the United States that the Merchant Marine Commission should be created, declared that at least one-half of the skilled shipyard workmen of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts were either altogether idle and in want or were working at common laborers' wages at any occupation they could get—digging ditches, sweeping streets, or some other form of the roughest and cheapest manual labor. There has been a slight improvement since then because of the building of a few coastwise vessels, but the situation is not materially changed. Right here and now in the height of our splendid prosperity there is one trade, and one trade only, in which American workmen by the thousands can find no employment and no wages. The sincerity of the devotion of Senators to the interests of labor will be demonstrated by their votes upon this shipping bill.

The passage of this bill will start into new life the shipyards of New England, Pennsylvania, Virginia, the Gulf ports, and the Pacific States. But, as has already been said, it will not benefit these coast States only, for the ships that will be built will make new markets for the products of every State and Territory in our nation. And the prosperity of the shipyards will mean prosperity for all the people, and especially for the farmers of the country, who provide the material to feed and clothe the mechanics of the seaboard.

SHIPYARDS AND FACTORIES.

The value of the protective tariff in encouraging manufacturing, and thereby making new markets for the products of the farms of the remotest Western States, has come to be well understood throughout America. A shipyard is a factory, and a mighty one. Few factories anywhere employ so large a proportion of highly skilled and well-paid labor. An American mechanic earning $3 a day in a Delaware shipyard is enabled to buy more and better food and better clothing and many other necessaries of life, which though necessaries here are luxuries abroad, that a workman earning $1.50 a day in a British shipyard can not afford. The American workman is twice as valuable as a customer for your western farms as a British workman with half his wages. Indeed, in actual effect one American workman is worth to your western farmers six times as much as a British workman in a British shipyard, for the American workman, you may be very certain, eats bread made from American grain and meat grown on American farms or ranches; he wears American clothes of cotton or of wool grown in this country. But the British workman, who builds the ships that now monopolize American trade, may or may not be a consumer of American grains or meats. It is very much more probable that his bread comes from India or Russia, and the meat he seldom eats from Argentina or Australia. One large American shipyard with 10,000 workmen is unquestionably worth more as a market for the farms of Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, or the Dakotas than all the workmen engaged in building North Atlantic ships in all the shipyards of the United Kingdom. Nor is it only these American shipyard workmen whose employment means a better market for the products of our western farms, for it must be remembered that a large part of the work of building a great ocean steamship is performed outside of the shipyard before the steel beams and plates and angles have been hauled inside the shipyard gates. The work begins when the iron ore to make the steel is dug out of the mines of Lake Superior or when the trees for the woodwork of the ship are felled in the forests of Georgia, Florida, and the Carolinas. These first processes of ship construction are performed far from the ocean. They give work and wages to men of the distant interior, who perhaps have never seen the ocean. As these materials are advanced from one process to another, they give employment to the men of your interior States, to the great steamers that come down the Lakes, to the railroads West and South that bring them from mill and forge to the yard where they are to be wrought into the finished vessel. A hundred million dollars a year in building new ships for ocean trade means the distribution of $95,000,000 in labor throughout all circles of trade and industry in the United States.

This is something to remember when men tell you that this bill is merely a bill to enrich shipowning and shipbuilding trusts and combinations. There is no shipowning trust or combination in ocean trade under the flag of the United States. The International Mercantile Marine Company, sometimes called the "Atlantic Steamship Trust," is the largest steamship company in the world, though no larger than two great German companies united. But this company has 120 foreign vessels and only 10 American.

And there is no ocean shipbuilding trust. That is a figment of the imagination. Ambitious men attempted several years ago to form a shipyard trust. Nine-tenths of American shipyards refused to enter it. Not one of the great shipyards of the Atlantic coast would consent to join. After a brief and stormy career this so-called "shipbuilding trust" went into the hands of receivers. As now reorganized it is building but a small fraction of the small tonnage now under construction in the United States.

Nine-tenths of American ocean shipyards are now and always have been independent of this combination and of any other. They are engaged in the fullest and freest kind of competition, and are subject, as all other corporations, to the Federal laws applied to combinations "in restraint of trade."

A MONOPOLY THAT MUST BE BROKEN.

So all talk of "fostering monopoly," "to enrich the great combinations," as applied to this bill is unfair and unfounded. There are combinations and monopolies in the shipping trade of the United States, but these are of foreign origin, foreign control, foreign ownership, and difficult to reach by American authority, beyond the full scope of American laws. And what monopoly could be more dangerous, more galling, more obstructive of the commerce and industry of the American people than that monopoly which exists to-day in the fact that nine-tenths of the imports and exports of America are conveyed in foreign ships by foreign seamen at a cost of about $200,000,000 a year? At least one-half of this immense sum, which has to be settled in gold or its equivalent, now drained out of this country, ought to remain here in the form of dividends on American capital and wages to American labor. This foreign domination of our own ocean carrying trade is a monopoly indefensible and intolerable—a menace to the security as well as to the prosperity of the Republic. There can be no party, no sectional difference over the imperative need of smashing forever a monopoly like this. It can only be done by creating a great fleet of American ships and a great naval reserve of American seamen. This bill of the Merchant Marine Commission is a long, straight step toward that end, and as such it demands the immediate and hearty approval of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, I have here three communications from the Commissioner of Navigation, giving certain statistics referred to by me, which I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The communications referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, January 26, 1906.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: Referring to your personal request yesterday afternoon, I inclose a statement (marked "A") of all the seagoing steam vessels built in the United States during the year ended December 31, 1905. The total, you will notice, is only eighteen vessels, of 35,199 gross tons. In addition to this, during the calendar year 1905 seventeen yachts, of 753 gross tons, were built, but they are hardly worth considering for your purposes. More than one-half of this tonnage is one ship of 20,714, built, as you will recall, for James J. Hill's railroad connections at Puget Sound to Japan and China. The Hill steamer, you will remember, took four years in building.

On the Delaware only four steamers, of 5,932 gross tons, were built.

You might compare the above statement with the output of Great Britain and Ireland during the calendar year 1905. The official figures have not yet reached me, but the Shipping World, a London publication and a recognized authority on shipping matters abroad, compiles every year from returns furnished by shipbuilders a table showing the construction in the United Kingdom during the past calendar year. This is printed shortly after the 1st of January, in advance of official figures, and I have just received it. I believe the figures to be entirely trustworthy. They show the output on the Clyde and in Scotland as 407 vessels, of 571,287 gross tons. The shipbuilding firm of Harland & Wolff, of Belfast, Ireland, last year built nine steamers, of 85,287 gross tons, or more than double the output of seagoing steam tonnage of the American yards. There were, indeed, six single British shipyards each of which built more seagoing steam tonnage during the last calendar year than was built in the entire United States during the same period. According to the Shipping World of January 3, 1906, the total output of the different centers of shipbuilding in the United Kingdom for 1905 was as follows:

	Number.	Tons.
The Tyne	135	322,749
The Wear	101	316,940
The Hartlepools	35	119,517
The Tees	40	132,751
The Thames	138	12,398
The Channel and West Coast	192	48,270
Ireland	35	144,743

CURRENT CONSTRUCTION.

My report for 1905, of which there are copies in Senator GALLINGER'S committee room, shows, at pages 10 to 13, the steel vessels under construction or under contract at the beginning of the fiscal year July 1, 1905. At that date there were forty-nine seagoing merchant steel vessels of 86,836 gross tons under construction or under contract. Some of these have since been completed, and the work under contract on some of the others has probably hardly yet gone further than the assembling of materials.

I have no similar tables at hand of foreign vessels under construction at the same time. I inclose (marked "B") Lloyds' statement for the world of vessels under construction on September 30, 1905. You will notice that in the United Kingdom at that time there were 474 vessels of 1,325,328 gross tons under construction. I have telegraphed to New York and shall probably receive to-morrow a statement showing the portion of those which were under construction on the Clyde.[a] You will notice that this return of Lloyds shows only twenty-six seagoing vessels of 38,474 gross tons under construction in the United States, of which twelve vessels of 24,824 gross tons were under construction on the Delaware. Lloyds' figures are a slight understatement for the United States. The Cramps, for example, are building four steamers for the New York and Cuba Mail Line (two of which are to replace vessels they sold to the Panama Canal Commission), aggregating about 28,000 tons. These were not contracted for until August, and, of course, were not covered by Lloyds' return, which allows only 24,824 under construction on the Delaware.

Making allowances for differences due to the fact that I include in my figures contracts for ships as well as ships the keels of which have actually been laid and for the fact that the ships covered in my table for July 1, 1905, by this time are either completed, or, in some instances, very close to completion, I believe you will be safe in using Lloyds' table inclosed as a fair statement of construction for the ocean trade in progress in American and foreign yards. Such rough comparison of steel steamers would be:

	Number.	Gross tons.
United Kingdom	444	1,319,718
Germany	67	221,070
United States	23	35,274

You will perceive the difficulty in making comparisons, but I trust I have made myself clear.

If I can be of service to you, please command me.

Respectfully,

E. T. CHAMBERLAIN, Commissioner.

A.—Seagoing steam vessels built (and officially numbered) from January 1 to December 31, 1905.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate.

SIR: Complying with the request, by telephone, this afternoon of your private secretary in regard to two Japanese steamers, I inclose copy of the consul's report referring to the matter which, I think, you have in mind.

Respectfully, E. T. CHAMBERLAIN, Commissioner.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Nagasaki, Japan, June 15, 1905.

Hon. FRANCIS B. LOOMIS,
Assistant Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: For your information I have to report that the Mitsu Bishi Dockyard and Engine Works contracted on the 9th instant to build at their works at Nagasaki for the Toyo Kisen Kaisha (Eastern Steamship Company), of Tokio, to run on their Hongkong-San Francisco line, two sister passenger steamers, of 13,000 tons gross each, one to be be delivered in thirty months and the second in thirty-six.

These vessels are to have a length between perpendiculars of 550 feet, a breadth of 63 feet, and a depth to the upper deck of 38 feet 6 inches. They will be built to Lloyds' 100 A1 and in accordance with the rules of the Japanese department of communications as well as the American Passenger Boat Regulations. They will have a speed of 19½ knots.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES B. HARRIS, Consul.

PROPOSED CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent at this time to take up the unobjected cases on the Pension Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. I exceedingly regret that I can not give consent. I have been endeavoring for two days to get consideration in executive session for an important matter, and I have said to Senators that I would move to go into executive session as soon as the Senator from Pennsylvania concluded.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suggest to the Senator that it is now only 5 minutes after 4 o'clock. We can probably get through the executive business in half an hour, and then, if the Senator has no objection, the Senate could resume its legislative session.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will quite agree to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope that course may be agreeable to the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 2, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 1, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COTTON STATISTICS.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a privileged report from the Committee on the Census.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana submits the following privileged report from the Committee on the Census, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be requested to direct the Director of the Census to compile and transmit to the House of Representatives the ginners' estimates of cotton remaining to be ginned which were collected in connection with its semimonthly canvass of January 16 last.

With the following amendments:

In line 2, after "requested," insert "if not incompatible with the public interests."

In line 5 strike out the word "its" and insert "his."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the law requires the Director of the Census to collect statistics of cotton ginned each year and to make semimonthly reports thereof, beginning on the 1st of September and concluding on the middle of January following. The law further requires the Director to make a final canvass and a final report in the month of March of all the cotton ginned during the year. It has been the custom of the Census Office for the last few years, in connection with the mid-January canvass, to procure estimates from the canvassers respecting the quantity of cotton that remains to be ginned. In many instances by the middle of January all the cotton in given counties has been ginned, and when that fact is known the Director can save the expense of sending canvassers into those counties to make the final canvass. The Director has collected these estimates purely for the purposes of his own office and to enable him intelligently and economically to make a canvass for the final report. The estimates are compiled and tabulated by counties only. I think they never have been tabulated by States, and no information has even been given out or obtained from the Census Office in relation to the results of these estimates. The Director is not required by law to make the estimates.

Mr. BURLESON. It was never intended that he should.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was never intended that he should. It is a voluntary matter with him, and he had the work done purely in the interest of economy; but market conditions of cotton are peculiar at this time, and there is a demand in many parts of the country that the public is entitled to the estimates and is entitled to all of the information the Director of the Census has in connection with the quantity of cotton yet remaining to be ginned. The president of the Cotton Ginners' Association came before the committee and said that practically all the cotton ginners insisted on this information. The president of the Cotton Growers' Association has wired and written the Director of the Census, insisting that the public is entitled to the cotton estimates. The Director of the Census, I think, realizes the fact that he made a tactical mistake in ever having got this information. In the statement he made before the committee, which is embodied in the report, he says that he never will collect estimates of this kind or of any other kind again without direct authorization by Congress.

Mr. BURLESON. It is the exclusive function of the Bureau of Statistics of the Agriculture Department to make estimates of the cotton crop, and as I now understand the gentleman from Indiana the Director positively assures us he will never again collect data embracing elements of estimation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He says that estimates will never be collected for any purpose, whatever expense may be saved, without authorization. He has been able by the estimates to save from eight to twelve thousand dollars in making the March canvass, but he realizes now it is very dangerous information to have about the office.

The committee concluded that there would be no harm to the office, and perhaps it would be as well if the public was given the information, such as it is. The estimates were made purely to enable the Director to know what counties should be canvassed in March and what might safely be omitted. They are necessarily imperfect, even as estimates.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman how this information is to be given out?

Mr. CRUMPACKER., This resolution requires that it be reported to the House. I suppose if it is to be given out, satisfactory arrangements can be made as to the method.

Mr. BURLESON. Why not amend the resolution by inserting the method in which he shall issue it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think that would destroy the privileged character of the resolution. Matter not privileged in a resolution of this kind will destroy its privilege. We have only the right to call for information from the head of a Department, and to provide in a resolution of inquiry directions respecting the execution of certain functions would destroy the privileged character of the resolution. I think it can be arranged so that the Director will give out the information in precisely the same manner that he gives out the semimonthly reports, or in the same manner as the Agricultural Department gives out estimates.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He must give it out to the Speaker of the House in a sealed envelope.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course the value of the statistical information is by the way of comparison. Is there any estimate by which comparisons can be made after this information comes out?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Nothing except that the country gets the amount of cotton actually ginned after the mid-January canvass. The estimates can be compared with former reports, but, of course, the seasons are so dissimilar—I mean the cotton-ginning season—that comparisons are not of great value. There is a controversy between the cotton owners and the cotton buyers—one class insisting that there are a million bales of cotton yet to be ginned, another class insists that there are not over a hundred thousand bales remaining to be ginned. The controversy seems to be sharp and bitter and the cotton market is in a feverish state, and these resolutions may have the effect of intensifying the controversy.

Mr. MANN. Is this information at all perfect or complete?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It consists of estimates made by official canvassers, who inquire of the ginners about how much there is to be ginned in the various counties in the January canvass.

Mr. SULZER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. Does this resolution carry any appropriation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; it does not.

Mr. MANN. I am asking for information, on account of what has appeared in the public press, which seems to indicate that there is nothing upon which a fair comparison can be based. The Director of the Census has stated the information was not complete and could not be used as a basis of comparison and might be very misleading.

Mr. LOVERING. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. LOVERING. May I suggest that it will be perfectly proper and safe for the information which has been asked for by this resolution to be placed in the hands of the Speaker and given out by the Clerk to-morrow morning at a given time, immediately after the reading of the Journal? I am satisfied that in no other way will it be absolutely satisfactory to everybody concerned.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I presume under the direction of this resolution the Director of the Census would transmit this information in a sealed envelope to the Speaker of the House, without giving anybody any information respecting the result of the estimate at all. If that is satisfactory to the gentleman, it can go to the Speaker in that way and the Speaker, of course, will lay it before the House.

Mr. LOVERING. In that case it would take the natural course, would it not?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in connection with my remarks the report of the committee, the statement of the Director of the Census as to the manner in which these estimates were taken, where they were taken, and what for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a communication from the Director of the Census touching this resolution, together with the report of the committee. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The report and communication are as follows:

The Committee on the Census, to whom was referred House resolution 199, recommend that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "requested," in line 2, the following: "if not incompatible with the public interests;" and by striking out the word "its," in line 5, and substituting therefor the word "his," and that the resolution thus amended do pass.

The Director of the Census is required under the law to collect statistics of the amount of cotton ginned throughout the country and make semimonthly reports thereon as the ginning progresses, beginning with the 1st of September and ending the 16th day of the following January in each year. The law further requires the Census Office to make a final report of all the cotton ginned in March of each year. For several years it has been the custom of the Census Office, in connection with the mid-January report, to procure estimates from the ginners as to the probable quantity of cotton remaining yet to be ginned. These estimates are gotten for the purpose of enabling the Director to know in what counties the cotton is all ginned, so he may not put the Government to the expense of having a canvass made where there is no cotton to be ginned after the mid-January canvass. The Census Office, by the aid of these estimates, is able to save from $8,000 to $10,000 a year in the making of the final canvass for the report in March. The estimates come from the canvassers in the several counties, and it is not necessary that they be tabulated or compiled, and this is not usually done.

When it is shown by the estimates that the cotton is practically all ginned in a given county, the Director does not employ a special agent to make a canvass of that county for the final report.

The cotton market is somewhat feverish at this time, and various assertions are made by those interested respecting the amount of cotton that remains unginned for the present year, and it has become known that the Census Office has estimates made by the various canvassers of the quantity remaining to be ginned. This information has excited considerable concern upon the part of cotton owners and cotton buyers, and repeated requests have been made to the Census Office for this information. The Director has declined to give out or permit any information respecting the estimates that the Office has to be given out. His position is that the estimates are made purely for the purpose of enabling him to know what counties should be canvassed for the final report that he may be able to do the work with as little expense as possible.

The Census Office is an office of actual statistics and not estimates, and it is contrary to the very purpose of the Office that it go into the business of making estimates of anything and giving them out for public information. In view, however, of the wide divergence between cotton buyers and cotton owners respecting the probable amount of cotton yet remaining unginned, the buyers insisting that there are upward of 1,000,000 bales and the cotton owners insisting that there are not more than 100,000 bales unginned, the estimates in the Office are of peculiar value.

The Director very properly declines to furnish any information respecting the estimates without being ordered to do so by Congress, and if he had supposed that any demand would have been made for them he probably would not have taken them. In a hearing before the Census Committee the Director explained his position respecting the estimates, and the manner in which they were secured, as follows:

"I will briefly state the facts in regard to the cotton estimates referred to in this resolution, and the attitude of the Director of the Census regarding their compilation and publication.

"First. I wish to state that it is no part of the function of the census to gather and make estimates of any kind. A census is a count—an enumeration; and the usefulness of the Census Office will be impaired, in my judgment, whenever it is required by law to substitute estimates, on any subject, for an actual count or enumeration. Estimates are necessary and important, in many matters; but in all such cases, if the Government must make them, the duty should be devolved upon some other Government bureau than the Census Office.

"Second. I desire to fully explain the reason why the Census Office at its mid-January canvass has called for these estimates by ginners of the quantity of cotton remaining to be ginned at that date. They are asked for solely as an aid to the Office in the efficient and economical administration of the law. They are used as a guide in the organization of the final canvass of the ginneries, which takes place in March. Wherever the estimates show that there is no more cotton to be ginned in a county or that the amount is insignificant, no final canvass is necessary.

"The possession of this information generally enables us to save from $8,000 to $12,000 in the cost of the final canvass. It is also useful in determining the best date for the final canvass, for it indicates if the season is unusually early or unusually late—a fact which should govern us more or less in fixing the proper date for the final canvass. No other use is made of it, and no question has ever arisen regarding its publication until this year. No question would have arisen now, but for the fact that some people think that the present market value of cotton depends upon the amount of cotton grown that remains unginned and therefore not hitherto reported. This demand, coming in this sudden way, is an experience from which I learn a lesson. Valuable and economical as these data have been to the office in reducing the cost of these cotton reports, they will never be asked for again while I remain Director, unless the law is amended to require them. They are too closely allied to dynamite to be a comfortable asset of the Census Office. We shall have to devise some new method of ascertaining what cotton-producing counties can properly be omitted from our final canvass.

"Third. The sole purpose of these estimates being an administrative one, the Census Office has never required a careful or accurate canvass, and the returns received have therefore always been defective and of no value from a statistical point of view. They answer the purpose for which they are intended if they possess only an approximate degree of accuracy. I have therefore declined, in response to many insistent requests, to make them public at this particular time.

"Fourth. As a matter of law, after a careful study of all the legislation on the subject, I believe the Director has no authority to promulgate these estimates.

"Fifth. But there is another reason for this declination, which I esteem no less important. I am unwilling on my own volition to depart in any way or degree from the established methods of the Census Office in the publication of these reports, without opportunity to previously inform the public of the intention, accompanied by a full explanation of the reasons why the change is made.

"The success of the cotton-statistical work which Congress has imposed upon the Census Office depends absolutely upon the public confidence in the integrity of the Office in the collection and publication of these data. We can only preserve this confidence by pursuing a straight and narrow pathway. Any deviation from that pathway must naturally arouse suspicion and raise the question: In whose interest is the change made?

"Sixth. If such a radical deviation is now to be made, the Director of the Census is not willing to accept the responsibility. No man, in Congress or out of it, has a right to ask him to assume such a responsibility. The best service he can render the Government is to do nothing which can be so construed or tortured as to justify a question as to the motive behind his act.

"Seventh. Congress has placed upon the Director of the Census the difficult duty of collecting and promulgating these reports on the quantity of cotton ginned to given dates. It is therefore the duty of Congress to protect the Director in the discharge of that duty. It was with a view to thus protecting him, as I understand it, that this resolution was introduced. Since the resolution is here, the House of Representatives must take the responsibility of saying whether the estimates referred to shall be given to the public or reserved for the purpose which led to their collection.

"If the House sees fit to command the Director of the Census to depart from the usual and understood method in the present case, as the President did when the date fixed for promulgating the first January canvass happened to fall upon a legal holiday in New Orleans, when the cotton exchange was closed, nobody can question his motives or action. If the House declines to pass this resolution, no one can criticise the Director for declining to do what he has never yet done or been expected to do."

While it is not desirable for the Census Office to procure estimates of the cotton crop or of any other crop, since the office is in possession of the estimates in question, it is doubtless better that they be made public without delay.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], the author of the resolution, for ten minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I think I can state clearly the object of introducing this resolution, as I introduced it myself. It has been sufficiently stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] why the Director asks for estimates, at the time he asked for the cotton ginned January 16. The cards sent out to make these inquiries were the cards sent out by the office to ascertain the amount actually ginned. Three sorts of information were asked for on these cards. First, how much was ginned between the 31st of December and the 16th of January? Second, how much was estimated, and, third, the weight of bales. Every ginner of the 30,000 or more to whom these cards were addressed gave answers to the inquiries, with some exceptions.

Every ginner knew that these inquiries were made. They published to the world that they had answered these inquiries, and then when the Director of the Census, acting under the law, published the amount of cotton ginned, which was all he had any authority to publish, the ginners naturally, and through them the people, could not understand why he had asked for information and only gave out the result of one of the three inquiries. In that way it became known that the ginners had reported to him the estimate of cotton to be ginned, and naturally the people who owned cotton wanted to know what that estimate was. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asked if there were any data by which comparisons might be made. I desire to state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that large cotton operators, speculators, and also cotton consumers and the members of the Cotton Exchange in New York and in New Orleans and of the Liverpool Cotton Association make estimates of the cotton to be ginned after each report. A very distinguished and celebrated operator in New York, Theodore Price, gave out immediately after the 16th of January report was made that there would be 700,000 bales of cotton to be ginned after that date, and further, as stated in the newspapers, that he was going to make an estimate of the cotton ginned to February 1. Now, as every operator of any consequence—as do the spinners and manufacturers—makes estimates of the cotton to be ginned, and have done so, it is certainly necessary, in order for the people to form a proper judgment of the amount of cotton grown for the year, to have the information of the amount yet to be ginned from the best possible source, and that is from the ginners themselves, who made it to the Director of the Census under an inquiry addressed directly to them. Why should it not be accurate? There is no more reason why this estimate should not be accurate than any other estimate made by those best fitted and qualified to make it. I hope there will not be remarks made here that are calculated to discredit this estimate in advance, because heretofore every year the ginners have been asked for the March report—to return the estimate of cotton yet to be ginned—and the Director of the Census has thought that of sufficient accuracy to publish it with his final report. I asked him, when before the committee—as I was present by the courtesy of the committee—if this inquiry for cotton to be ginned to be reported on the 16th of January was not of the exact form and manner that he made the inquiry for the final estimate to be made by the ginners, and he said that it was. So this House and the country will have the estimate of the ginners themselves, who do the ginning, who are acquainted in their respective neighborhoods, who have the best possible opportunity to know what cotton remains to be ginned. This information will be of value to those who want to buy cotton and to those who want to sell cotton. The producers are all sellers and the consumers are all purchasers, and this information comes from the best and most reliable source. There never was, of course, an estimate that was absolutely accurate, and neither is it expected that this will be absolutely accurate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that not only has it been taken in the usual form upon the usual cards, but out of the 800 cotton counties, 682 are tabulated and lie in the Census Office tabulated, and it makes a dangerous element to the public to have those things lying there in a private way. It is absolutely necessary that they should be given to the public.

Mr. SIMS. I accept the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], but do not give it as my own knowledge, for I have not made inquiry.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I state it on my own knowledge. I got it from Mr. North.

Mr. SIMS. Further, the Director of the Census has no objection to this resolution, but would be glad to have it pass, because there lies that information in the hands of three men. Only three know it—the Director himself, Mr. Stewart, and Mr. Roper—and if this resolution does not pass, it is held there until the final canvass in March, with those men subject to every possible accusation and suspicion, however wrongfully. Not that there is anything of suspicion in their conduct or any just grounds for it, but we know what happened in the Agricultural Department—parties there who had not been suspected turned out to be giving valuable information to certain interested parties and benefited by it. So they think and I think that they should be relieved from that responsibility. I accept their word in the best of good faith that they have obtained this information as the means of helping along the administration of their Office in the most economical manner, but, as I look at it, if they have it, the world had better know what it is rather than suspect what it is.

Mr. BURLESON. Do you not think it would be much better if this announcement should be made by the Director of the Census in the usual way, and not through the House at all?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how that could be done; for instance——

Mr. BURLESON. It can be done by amending this resolution by unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMS. Here is an inquiry addressed by order of Congress to a Department to make report to Congress. That report comes in the usual way in a sealed envelope to the Speaker of the House, and the Speaker of the House makes known to the House the communication in the usual way. Now, then, to undertake to direct it in any other way I do not think would comport with the dignity of this House. To call for information from a Department of the Government and authorize the chief of Bureau to make it public at the time he sends it to the Speaker of the House, I think the Speaker himself would hardly feel he has received the deference to which he is entitled for a subordinate to make known his reply to the House before the Speaker has received it himself.

Mr. BURLESON. The purpose was to put everybody upon an equal footing.

Mr. SIMS. Everybody will get it exactly at the same time if made known in the usual way.

Mr. GRIGGS rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I thought the gentleman from Tennessee had finished, and I wanted to get the floor.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not got a bale of cotton actual or in contract. I am neither long nor short. I personally have no interest in introducing this resolution, but I think it best for the country and best for the Census Bureau itself, so everybody can do their own guessing after they receive the best source of information upon which to base guesses.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. Do you believe that the adoption of this resolution will have a tendency to do away to some extent with gambling in cotton options on the New York Cotton Exchange? If it does not, it ought to be amended to stop this riotous gambling in futures.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know. It may accelerate it, but I assure the gentleman that that is not my object and purpose. I can not foresee what will be the effect. As the gentleman from Indiana says, we do not know what it is ourselves; that we do not know what the effect will be, but I always think the truth is better than uncertainty or guesses.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt whatever truth is better, but sometimes the publication of a half truth is much worse than if they did not publish anything, and that is the only point, I think, the House wants information about.

Mr. SIMS. The House wants to know how much cotton the ginners estimate is yet to be ginned. That will be the truth. Whether the estimate is correct or incorrect is a question for everybody's judgment.

Mr. MANN. That is true if these estimates are at all complete or accurate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is all the Department of Agriculture has, estimates, and they put it out.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this resolution for the reason it is another effort to throw out information in relation to the cotton market. A similar effort was made about three weeks ago, and a resolution was introduced and referred to the Agricultural Committee, asking for a supplemental report from the Department of Agriculture on the cotton crop. The gentleman from Indiana has referred to the fact that the people interested in this are the producers of cotton and the consumers of cotton—the manufacturers. There is another class interested in this, which are the merchants engaged in the cotton business. They appeared before the Committee on Agriculture, and the demand for the supplemental report of the Agricultural Department on the estimated cotton crop was almost unanimously refused by the Committee on Agriculture. And, Mr. Speaker, very wisely so, for the one thing that is necessary, in my judgment, both to the manufacturer and to the raiser of cotton, is certainty, and not this continual upset of prospects of the price of cotton, so that those who are actually engaged in the business of producing and manufacturing cotton shall not be subject to the ups and downs of the cotton market in New York. It is the people who are interested in speculation that are continually asking for these further reports. And why? Those who wish to raise the price of cotton are disappointed in the last report and demand another, hoping it will be in their direction, and those who are gambling to depress the price of cotton demand a supplemental report, either from the Agricultural Department or from the Census Bureau, in the hope it will favor them. Now, Mr. Speaker, the one subject, in my judgment, that is more important than anything else, and particularly to the mercantile class, in whose interests I am speaking now, and who have a great interest in this—for in their business above all they are neither trying to push up the price of cotton nor depress it as are these other conflicting interests—is that they desire that certainty which all merchants want, so that they can make their contract for the future with some certainty as to the result.

I trust this further effort, which failed so utterly before the Committee on Agriculture, will again fail. That committee certainly ought to be better informed on this subject than any other committee of this House. The resolution demanding a supplemental report was almost unanimously rejected by that committee. In regard to the purpose of the present resolution, there is quite a difference of opinion among the best informed as to whether the Agricultural Department or the Census Bureau should make adverse reports. You have two Departments of the Government making reports on identically the same subject, and they come in here conflicting one with the other. In my judgment, this resolution should not prevail, for the reason I have stated, and that when the same subject was before the Committee on Agriculture it was almost unanimously rejected.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING].

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the resolution itself, there is no difference of opinion between the Members of the House on the one side or the other. The only question that arises is as to the method of making it public. It seems to me it is perfectly proper to let it go, as all other information goes, to the Speaker of the House, to be treated as he shall choose to treat it, either to refer it to a committee or have it announced on the floor of the House. That seems to me to be right. There is another course which seems to me to be perfectly feasible, proper, and unobjectionable and which I will embody in an amendment and offer to the present resolution at the proper time, as follows:

On page 1, line 3, after the word "and," strike out the words "transmit to the House of Representatives" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "announce the same in the same manner of announcing his semimonthly reports of cotton ginned."

Mr. BURLESON. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think he ought to fix the hour in there?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Massachusetts just read something which I understood he would propose as an amendment at the proper time or offers now.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman asked unanimous consent, as I understand it.

Mr. PAYNE. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not now subject to amendment in the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING].

The SPEAKER. For what purpose did the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yielded three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I want to know if his time has expired. When the gentleman has finished, I will claim the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to offer an amendment, to which there is objection at this time.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I do not offer it at this time. I gave notice that I should offer it.

I desire to say, for the information of the gentleman from New York, that if this is adopted by the House it will stop, if anything can stop, exactly what the gentleman is trying to stop. There is no difference of opinion beween Members on one side or the other, whether of the market or of this House, North or South, cotton spinner or dealer. There is no difference of opinion as regards this resolution. We all agree on it, and I think the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I objected to this amendment because I do not wish to hasten by the action of the House the getting of information to help speculating and gambling in cotton. I neither want to help the bulls nor help the bears. I am getting heartily sick and tired of this continued attempt to force information, which is not full information, but half information, upon the country upon this subject. I think it is bad enough when we get the full returns and the full official information. As I understand it to-day, the Director of the Census has sent out to the various cotton-gin establishments in the States, so far as he has been able, in order to get information to report next month upon this subject. I understand he says himself that it is not full information; that he has not sent inquiries into all the counties; that it will not be complete when it comes in. Therefore I do not think that the House ought to be used in this way, or the power of the House or the Census Bureau to get imperfect information—advance information, which is imperfect—in regard to the cotton crop. I think it is bad enough if we wait for the time when this information is due, because when it does come it always works either to unduly advance the price of cotton or unduly depress the price of cotton. It is unfair both to the dealers and the consumers that this perpetual or weekly or monthly attempt should be made in the House to get information which is not as full as it would be at the end of the year, or at the usual time. Therefore I am opposed to this amendment, and I do not believe in the resolution. I think we ought to wait until we get the full report.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say to the gentleman from New York that the information is as perfect as it ever has been in the Census Bureau or the Agricultural Bureau.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I understand the Director himself says that it is not as full and complete and perfect as he will have by the usual time in March; and we all know about those things that they are not as complete as they ought to be at the last.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say to the gentleman that I personally saw the cards which have been sent out and the answers made, and the information is as perfect as it will ever be, and Mr. North said so to me in person. Now, you have it.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, there seems to be difference about that. The information comes officially to the House, and I see no reason to retract any statement I have made in regard to the incomplete investigation. It can have but one result, and that is either to unduly advance or unduly depress the price of cotton, either of which is a wrong upon the consumer or upon the grower of the country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. May I ask the gentleman from New York to be a little more specific as to the manner and respect in which this will depress or advance the price of cotton?

Mr. PAYNE. If there is a return of a big cotton crop, then, of course, the price goes down; if there is a return of a light cotton crop, then it goes up; and the gentleman knows that if they go into the produce exchange and get to buying or selling cotton or any other commodity that the prices are either unduly advanced or depressed by any such report. That is always the result.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But I do not understand, if the gentleman will allow me, that this goes to the future, but to the past. What is there in it that authorizes you to say so?

Mr. PAYNE. This refers to the present crop—the crop partially ginned and to be ginned in the future. It affects the crop coming into market and nothing else.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not so understand.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely regret that this data, which can not be correctly termed "statistical information," has been gathered by the Director of the Census. It was never intended when this plan of gathering cotton statistics was inaugurated that the Director of the Census should at any time gather information or statistical data into which there entered in the slightest degree the element of estimation. It was intended that the Bureau of Census should deal only with accomplished facts and should at no time venture into the field of speculation as to what might be. But, gentlemen, inasmuch as the Census Bureau has gathered this data, which, according to what has been said, is not properly census work, but is only an estimate, and inasmuch as it is charged that it can be used, or might if improperly used, to seriously affect the price of this great staple, I can not see how we can refuse to make it public. In fact, I think it wise to promptly publish it to all the world. It is very gratifying to me to know that the assurance has been given by the Director of the Census that he will never permit this character of data to again be gathered.

I only regret that the data he has gathered this time and which is now under discussion can not be burned or destroyed rather than be made public; but inasmuch as that can not be, I agree with the proponent of the resolution, and I hope that it will be adopted and the information made public at the earliest practicable moment. I do believe, however, that we ought to give unanimous consent to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], or in some way accomplish the purpose of his amendment—that is, provide that at an hour fixed the Director of the Census shall give out this information in the same manner that he has heretofore given out the ginners' report. If that is done, no criticism can be directed against any person that the information has been given out prematurely or in an unusual manner.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLERBE].

Mr. ELLERBE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that to every ginner in the entire cotton belt was sent a card. On that card the ginner was asked to state not only how many bales of cotton he had ginned up to the evening of the 15th, but "How many bales of cotton do you estimate your establishment will gin during the remainder of the cotton season?" These cards were sent to every ginner in the 812 counties throughout the cotton-growing section. These cards came in, and that information is in the hands of the Census Department.

Now, what is the question? The estimates vary from 100,000 bales to 1,000,000 bales, and the speculator is going to have an estimate if he has to make it himself. Now, these men, three or five, have this information, and I stand up and say it would be in the interest of the Census Department to let that information go out.

Already I have heard rumors and whisperings that the information has leaked, and when I say that men would give millions of dollars for the information, I say we owe it to ourselves, to the cotton spinner, and we owe it to the Census Department to bring that information out at the earliest possible moment. [Applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CRUMPACKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12314. An act to amend an act approved February 3, 1905, authorizing the construction of a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.; and

H. R. 297. An act to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—COUDREY AGAINST WOOD.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, by direction of Committee on Elections No. 2, I present the following privileged report and ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas in the contested-election case of Coudrey v. Wood, from the Twelfth Congressional district of Missouri, which was referred to the Committee on Elections No. 2, a motion has been made to suppress the testimony of contestant on the ground, among others, that as forwarded to the Clerk of the House and printed it is not the testimony as given by the witnesses, but has been materially altered by leaving out certain parts thereof and by adding to and changing other parts, so as to completely destroy the integrity of said testimony; and

Whereas, owing to the conflicting statements contained in ex parte affidavits filed in support of and in opposition to said motion, it is impossible to ascertain the truth of the matter: Therefore, be it

tions No. 2 shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to take such testimony as it shall deem necessary to the determination of questions of fact in the contested-election case of Coudrey v. Wood, from the Twelfth district of Missouri, and shall have power to send for all such persons and papers as it may find necessary for the proper determination of said controversy, and determine the time, place, and manner of taking said testimony, which may be taken before the said committee or any subcommittee or any person selected by said committee for such purpose, and that the expenses incurred in taking said testimony shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House upon the order of said Committee on Elections No. 2.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the testimony in this case, as printed in a volume of 1,409 pages, has been submitted by the Clerk of the House to the committee, and also the originals from which the said publication was made. Upon the face of these papers the testimony appears to have been regularly taken, signed by the witnesses, and certified by the notaries public before whom it was taken, and to be regular in every respect. But the contestee has submitted a motion to suppress all the contestant's testimony for various reasons, most of which are technical, but one of which seems to the committee to be of importance, namely: That the testimony as returned to Washington and printed by the Clerk is not the testimony given by the witnesses, but that the same has been altered, some parts omitted, some things added, and some portions changed. There have been submitted ex parte affidavits of two stenographers who took the testimony, who state that under instructions of a certain gentlemen they changed certain portions of the testimony. That gentleman makes affidavit denying their statements. The affidavits of ten witnesses were filed to the effect that when upon the witness stand they were cross-examined, but no cross-examination appears in the report of their testimony. Against that there is the affidavit of a female stenographer, who says that under the direction of the contestee she prepared a uniform style of affidavit—blank forms—in which these ten are all made, and that the persons who made them received small sums of money for making these affidavits.

That is denied in another affidavit on behalf of the contestee. Other ex parte affidavits of stenographers have been submitted to the effect that the contestee offered the affiants money to make false affidavits to the effect that the testimony as taken down by them had been changed. On the other hand, there are affidavits to the effect that the stenographers who made those affidavits offered to make affidavits on behalf of contestee, but demanded money for so doing. There is some testimony tending to show that the contestee brought suit against certain persons for the purpose of coercing them and getting them to make affidavits; and one lady says, to use her own language, "He frightened me to death," after which she made an affidavit. There is also the testimony of one stenographer that under instructions he changed in various respects answers from "no" to "yes" in material parts of the testimony.

To make a long story short, these ex parte affidavits are so utterly conflicting in their character that it is impossible from them to ascertain the truth of the matter, and believing it important that the question of the integrity of this testimony shall at the outset be determined, the committee has unanimously agreed to recommend the adoption of the resolution which has been read from the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 83, for a report, and so forth, upon the preservation of Niagara Falls.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following House joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the members representing the United States upon the International Commission created by section 4 of the river and harbor act of June 30, 1902, be requested to report to Congress at an early day what action is, in their judgment, necessary and practicable to prevent the further depletion of water flowing over Niagara Falls; and the said members are also requested and directed to report, in conjunction with the members of said Commission representing the Dominion of Canada, if practicable, all possible efforts for the preservation of the said Niagara Falls in their natural condition.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTON of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference of a memorial from the American Association of the Masters, Mates, and Pilots of Steam Vessels, asking for the passage of the joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a commission to appraise the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It pertains to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, and should go to the Committee on Railways and Canals. I ask unanimous consent that that change of reference be made.

The SPEAKER. This being a private memorial, ordinarily would be, and can, in this instance, under the rule, be indorsed by the gentleman from Ohio as chairman of his committee, and referred as the committee designated, through the basket. It need not come before the House, although, as it is before the House, there is no objection to doing it by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that it be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REPRINT OF BILL H. R. 405.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill H. R. 405. I find that it has been exhausted. Members yesterday were unable to get the bill from the document room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

MEETING AT 11 O'CLOCK.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12987, the railroad-rate bill, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the sessions of the House during the continuance of the present special order may begin at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the sessions of the House during the continuance of the present special order shall begin at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. WILLIAMS. An inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa. Does the gentleman intend that to apply to the time consumed in general debate or to the five-minute rule as well? Will the House meet at 11 o'clock not only during the continuance of the general debate, but also during the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. HEPBURN. The request was during the continuance of the special order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That includes the five-minute rule?

Mr. HEPBURN. That would include the five-minute rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman be willing to modify that and say during general debate?

Mr. HEPBURN. If there is any preference for that, I will modify the request to that extent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask only for information. I would not object in either event.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if he will modify that request so as to take up that debate immediately after the reading of the Journal, I would not have any objection, but it would compel people to come here who might not want to come and might have something else to do, in committees, for instance, that might be running at that hour, and this unanimous-consent business and all that kind of matter, if they come in at 11 o'clock, which would compel people to come here who have something else to do elsewhere, as I say.

Mr. HEPBURN. I suppose that under the order any Member could prevent that unanimous consent, because under the special order this bill is the subject for consideration after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I suppose there would be no trouble about finding some one to come here and stand guard for an hour, if it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I wish the gentleman from Missouri would come over here and do it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would do it at the special request of any gentleman. I would not want to do it on my own responsibility. Mr. Speaker, I rose to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]: It is suggested by some of my colleagues over here that during the five-minute rule it might not be necessary to meet at 11 o'clock and that we apply this 11 o'clock meeting only to general debate. I think it is necessary to do that or we will never get through, with the number of requests we have for time.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I will yield again to the gentleman and modify my request so as to meet his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that during general debate upon the bill covered by the special order the House meet at 11 o'clock a. m. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad-rate bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad-rate bill—with Mr. VREELAND in the chair.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KNAPP].

Mr. KNAPP. Mr. Chairman, the importance of this question termed "rate legislation" is recognized and conceded. It constitutes in itself a difficult problem, and while we differ as to what may be wisest and best, nearly all are agreed that the solution should be such as will be effective in correcting existing inequalities and remedying existing evils in transportation rate making. In framing remedial legislation we should recognize the just rights of all—individuals, communities, and corporations. The problem involves the question of transportation, and so its solution directly affects the people and industries of every locality and all sections of the country.

Transportation has passed through repeated stages of advancement, and in each has been an important factor in social, commercial, and industrial development. Leading in this advancement in transportation has been the United States. In no other nation beneath the sun has its development been so rapid, its influences so great, and its resultant problems so important. The railway branch of transportation, with which this proposed legislation especially deals, has developed until the total railway mileage of the United States aggregates, in round numbers, about 215,000 miles, a mileage nearly equaling that of one-half of the railway systems of the world. These railways number 2,104, and the total cost of their construction was, in round numbers, about twelve and one-half billions of dollars. Their total gross earnings for the year ending June 30, 1905, amounted, in round numbers, to $2,073,000,000. The total operating expenses during the same period of time aggregated $1,383,000,000. The number of passengers reported as carried for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, was 715,419,682; the number of tons of freight reported as carried during the same period was 1,309,809,165. These statistics suffice to well illustrate the commanding importance of our railway systems.

But more than keeping pace and commensurate with this has been our commercial and industrial development, evidenced in varied and unrivaled industries and emphasized in a foreign trade aggregating in value $2,455,000,000, and, of still more significance, in an internal trade and commerce aggregating in value $22,000,000,000—a sum equal to the total value of the combined international commerce of the world. Evidenced in nearly every locality and on nearly every hand is this wonderful industrial progress, alike the pride of our own and the marvel of the nations of the world.

That railway transportation has been one of the most important factors in this development must be justly conceded. That American railways which span the continent and vein the country are unrivaled in the railway world is also our just pride. But all of this does not destroy the fact that these corporations, by virtue of charter rights and also their relationship to commerce and the public, should be so managed or regulated that they do not oppress but serve the best interests of the people. The very fact that the relationship which exists between railway transportation and the people is, and of necessity must be, interdependent justifies the Congress in so regulating the one that it shall fairly serve the other; in other words, justifies Congress in so regulating or in so providing for the regulation of transportation rates that they shall be equally just to all localities and equally fair to all shippers; in still other and better terms, justifies Congress in so legislating that, in the words of the President, the "highways of commerce may be kept open to all on equal terms."

THE QUESTION IMPORTANT, BUT NOT NEW.

Neither illustration nor argument is needed to emphasize the importance of the pending legislation. It is concededly one of the most important measures which will be submitted to Congress for consideration and action. If proof of this were needed, it could be found in the brief but convincing statement that authentic reports place the total value of the farm products of the United States for the past year at, in round numbers, $6,000,000,000; that of the manufacturing products for the same period at, in round numbers, $13,000,000,000. Transportation is the medium by which these products are conveyed to markets, and whatever affects the rate of transportation necessarily affects all connected with or dependent upon these industries; but it is none the less important to other and varied industries. In short, it involves the rights and affects the interests of individuals and corporations, of shippers and common carriers, of producers and consumers of every locality.

The contention that this is a new departure in legislation or that Government regulation of railways is an untried experiment of doubtful constitutional right is not well founded. This question is one which has been agitated, discussed, investigated, and legislated upon for the past twenty-five years. During that period of time it has been the subject of investigation and of legislative action by State legislatures and Congress, and, as a result, thirty-one States of the Union have passed laws or created commissions for the purpose of regulating railway transportation rates. These commissions have been clothed with varied powers, from those of investigation and recommendation to the authority to establish transportation rates or charges. Two-thirds of these States have delegated to commissions so created the authority to regulate and establish transportation rates or charges, and the right to delegate such power has not been successfully questioned, but repeatedly confirmed by judicial tribunals. These commissions, however, have possessed that authority only so far as State commerce is concerned, or commerce conveyed between State boundaries, which aggregates only about 30 per cent of the total commerce transported by railways. The remaining 70 per cent so transported is interstate commerce, or commerce passing State boundaries, and so far as legislative control is concerned is under the jurisdiction of the General Government.

Congress has, by repeated legislative enactment, sought to keep these highways of interstate commerce open to all on equal terms. Nineteen years ago, or in 1887, Congress passed the so-called "interstate-commerce law." That law created a commission and vested it with certain powers. As to this law, the Commission, and its work, I will refer more at length hereafter. Suffice it to say that law was, in its main provisions, an initial act in Government regulation of railways engaged in interstate commerce and was intended to be a remedy for existing inequalities in transportation rates and charges.

Later, and in 1898, the importance of this question was recognized by Congress in the appointment of an industrial commission composed of members of both Houses, one of the main duties of which was to inquire into the question of railway transportation rates or charges, and with which subject its report extensively dealt. Still later, in 1903, Congress enacted what is known as the "Elkins law," a much-needed law, aimed at the system of rebates and intended to prevent the granting of such rebates in any form, and still later, at the last session of Congress, legislation upon this subject was attempted by the passage in the House of the so-called "Esch-Townsend bill," conferring added powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in its provisions much akin to the measure now before us.

These and other illustrations which might be cited are convincing of the fact that for more than a quarter of a century the importance of the question of Government regulation of railway transportation has engrossed the thought and discussion of the people and been the subject of legislative enactment both by the State legislatures and the National Congress.

LEGISLATION NECESSARY.

That added legislation on this subject is necessary is virtually conceded. Differences of opinion as to form and conditions of enactment may exist, but that some legislation which will be remedial in its resultant effects should be enacted nearly all agree. By individual petition, and through organizations and legislative bodies, the people are still making known their wish and will. This is not a mistaken public sentiment. It is founded in and based upon conditions which have too long existed, and which call for some measure that will give effective relief.

But while this is true, no legislation is demanded or asked for that will jeopardize any legitimate interest. None is demanded, or should be enacted, the tendency of which would be to foster one and break down another industry. That would be only to aggravate existing evils. In framing a remedial law we need not proceed upon the theory that everything is wrong, and all must be righted; neither upon the theory that the interests of the shipper and carrier are irrevocably antagonistic, but rather may we proceed upon the conviction that the rights and the interests of the shipper and carrier are, in the true sense, in the common. Legislation which recognizes this as a basic principle, and which at the same time provides that common carriers shall give fair and uniform treatment to all shippers, will be most effective in regulating existing wrongs.

The causes which render necessary the pending legislation are too patent to admit of denial or serious question. Time is not mine, neither is it necessary, to discuss them in detail. They are in the main familiar to all. They may largely be grouped under one head, or, as has been correctly stated, described in one word, namely, "discriminations." That is the one prime evil in rate making. It is against that as well as excessive rates that the shipper and the public justly protest. It is to prevent that as well as excessive rates that legislation has been and should be enacted. With the evil of discrimination eliminated, the problem of rate making would be well on the way to satisfactory solution. Discrimination in freight rates is not only wrong in principle and far-reaching in ill effects, but added to this its resultant burdens in the main fall just where they should not and upon those least able to bear them, namely, the individual and the smaller shipper. The farmer or manufacturer who ships to market only the products of his own industry has the right to know that he receives from the common carrier the same treatment as do his fellow-shippers. Transportation rates are important factors, not only in determining markets and fixing prices, but also in measuring profits, and the smaller shipper, be he individual or corporation, has the right to demand that his more affluent or powerful competitor does not receive a preferential rate, which works injury and perhaps ruin to his own industry. This is a right guaranteed to him both by common and statuory law. Granting to one shipper a preferential rate over another for a like service rendered is in violation of a well-established common-law rule and also repeated statutory enactments.

Discriminations may be of so varied a kind that it is impossible to detail them. They may, however, in the main, be collectively grouped as those between individuals, corporations, and localities. Perhaps those which are most widely practiced, most injurious in their results, and most justly complained of are embraced in what is known as the "system of rebates," a system under which shippers are charged published or uniform rates and rebates allowed back to some, resulting in widespread discrimination, and under which it is charged that large corporations and corporate combinations have not only reaped fabulous profits, but have been enabled to cripple and drive out of business competing industries. Akin to this is the so-called "private car system," a system by which private or corporate car companies owning their own cars obtain discriminating rates of transportation, and also the private terminal system, under which companies or corporation utilize branch or yard tracks for the purpose of organizing railway companies, and thereby obtain from the railroads a discrimination in rates for transporting the output of their industries.

These illustrations suffice to show how and to what extent discriminations have been practiced, not all of which, however, it is just to say, have been invited by the railways. Laws have been enacted the intent and purpose of which were to eliminate these evils and to prevent the entire rebate system. This was the special purpose of the so-called "Elkins law," passed by Congress in 1903. That law, while not in detail or form, was, nevertheless, in fact an amendment, and the first important amendment, to the interstate-commerce law under which it had been mistakenly assumed discriminations could be effectively prevented. The Elkins law, which was stringent in its terms and which, as has been stated, was especially aimed at the rebate system, made it unlawful "for any person, persons, or corporations to offer, grant, or to give or to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of transportation of any interstate or foreign commerce by common carriers."

Results for a time seemed to establish the efficacy of that law, but recent developments, including numerous indictments for granting and receiving rebates, demonstrate that the law has not been wholly preventative, and that discriminations in transportation rates and rebates are yet practiced. The law, valuable to a certain extent for the purpose for which it was more especially enacted, failed in important particulars to either amend or supplement the interstate-commerce law. It made the schedule of transportation rates as published and filed the standard, and provided a remedy which, if enforced, would correct deviations from such rates, but failed to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission, or to any legal regulating body, the right or authority to supervise or correct a schedule of transportation rates, or a rate which might be unjust, or the practice of which might result in discrimination. And it is to accomplish such a purpose and delegate such right and authority that alike injustice to and in the best interests of both shipper and common carrier the pending measure providing for reasonable Government regulation is made necessary.

Discriminations in transportation rates, whether by rebates, private-car systems, terminal facilities, or in any other manner, should be effectively abolished and uniform rates, equally just to all, should be effectively established.

Well and correctly did the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], in his masterly discussion of this question in the second session of the last Congress, say:

> The law says that the rates of the carrier must be reasonable. The law says that they must not indulge in any kind of discrimination. The law says that they shall not give preference to any shipper. The law says that they shall not charge more for a short haul than for a long one, if it is included in the same distance and under the same circumstances. The law says that they shall not engage in any device, in any practice, in any means of that kind where equal opportunity is not given to all. That is the law. Obedience to that law would have satisfied the whole people.

Words could not better express both the intended purpose of existing law and the necessity for added enactment than those of the distinguished gentleman whose name this proposed legislation bears. True, there are laws upon the statute books; true, those laws have not been obeyed, and one of the reasons for this has been that those laws have not provided a procedure by which obedience to their provisions may be made speedy and certain.

CONGRESS HAS POWER TO ENACT NEEDED LEGISLATION.

That Congress has power over interstate commerce is conceded. That its power to regulate the transportation rates or charges of carriers engaged in such commerce is unquestioned. The Constitution vests in Congress certain powers, among them:

> To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes. (Constitution of United States, sec. 8, clause 3, Art. I.)

The power thus vested is broad and comprehensive, and is not subject to any limitation which deprives Congress of the right to regulate transportation rates of railways engaged in interstate commerce. The wisdom of this provision of the Constitution becomes apparent in view of the fact, as before stated, that of the commerce of the United States by far the larger portion—over 70 per cent—is interstate and not subject to State supervision, but the sole legislative control of which is vested in the General Government. Under that provision of the Constitution Congress has heretofore legislated on this subject of Government control or regulation of railways engaged in interstate commerce, and the power to so legislate can not be successfully questioned. Further than this, judicial decisions are uniform to the effect that the making and fixing of rates being a legislative and not a judicial function the legislative body—the Congress—may by direct legislative enactment fix the future maximum rate of a common carrier or establish a standard of rates and delegate to a commission, duly constituted, the authority to administer or carry into effect such enactment; in either case, however, subject to review by the courts as to whether such rate or schedule of rates is in violation of the provisions of the Constitution which prohibit the taking of property without due process of law. Numerous decisions might be quoted to this effect, but as confirmatory of this power we have the opinion of the present distinguished and able Attorney-General, rendered by him in May last. In that opinion the Attorney-General says:

> There is a governmental power to fix the maximum future charges of carriers by railroad vested in the legislatures of the States with regard to transportation exclusively within the States and vested in Congress with regard to all other transportation.
> Although legislative power, properly speaking, can not be delegated, the law-making body having enacted into law the standard of charges which shall control, may intrust to an administrative body not exercising in the true sense judicial power the duty to fix rates in conformity with that standard.
> The rate-making power is not a judicial function and can not be conferred constitutionally upon the courts of the United States, either by way of original or appellate jurisdiction.
> The courts, however, have the power to investigate any rate or rates fixed by legislative authority and to determine whether they are such as would be confiscatory of the property of the carrier, and if they are judicially found to be confiscatory in their effect to restrain their enforcement.
> Reasonable, just, and impartial rates determined by legislative authority are not within the prohibition of article 1, section 9, paragraph 6, of the Constitution, even though they result in a varying charge per ton per mile to and from the ports of the different States.

This opinion may be accepted as a correct interpretation of the law, and conclusive as to the power of Congress to enact necessary legislation.

THE PENDING MEASURE.

The importance of this question being conceded, the necessity for added legislation on this subject being established, and the power of Congress to enact such legislation being unquestioned, we come to the added and important question, Does the bill before the House now being considered meet the requirements and provide the remedy by which transportation rates of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce may be made both reasonable and uniform? I believe it does, and so believing give to it my unqualified support. The pending measure is, as it is entitled, "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887,'" etc. In other words, it is an amendment to the original interstate-commerce law which created the Interstate Commerce Commission and clothed the same with certain powers.

It is not my purpose to consume the time of the House with lengthy discussion of this bill, but rather to call attention to and briefly discuss some of its most important provisions. Among these, and of special importance, is the provision contained in section 4, amendatory of section 15 of the original interstate-commerce act, as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 15 of said act be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 15. That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged and what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed; and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation, to the extent to which the Commission find the same to exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed, and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction."

Section 13, referred to in the above amendment, is the section which authorizes the shipper, who may feel aggrieved at a rate imposed by the carrier, to make complaint to the Commission and empowers the Commission to investigate the question of the reasonableness of the rate so complained of. And right here is not only one of the most important provisions of this bill, but one of the most sure protection to the shipper and the public. Under this amendment the Commission has not only the authority heretofore conceded to entertain the complaint of the shipper and make investigation, but also the added authority to determine what shall be a reasonable and fairly remunerative maximum rate or charge for the future, and to issue an order making such rate or charge effective, and providing penalties for noncompliance with such order on the part of the railways or common carrier.

During the nearly nineteen years that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been in existence, more than 4,000 complaints against common carriers have been lodged with the Commission. These complaints, and the issues involved in them, have been disposed of in various ways; some by dismissal, some by adjustment with the railways, some by hearings had and by decisions of the Commission, etc. That the law has been productive of good, and that the Commission has with signal industry, fidelity, and ability executed its trust and served the public welfare can not be successfully questioned.

But during all this time the law has been defective. For ten years the Commission was supposed to have the authority to declare, after full hearing and investigation, what a reasonable rate or charge should be for the future, but when the celebrated Maximum Rate Case was decided, and it was held by the highest judicial tribunal that the Commission had no power to fix a maximum future rate, then the Commission became powerless as a regulator of freight rates. Many of the decisions of the Commission have been reversed by the courts, not on the question of fact presented, but because of its not having the authority, under the law, to make the order which it did make, so that if criticisms have been made against the Commission, and they have, they have been criticisms for not doing what the law gave them no authority to do. There have been criticisms for not doing an impossibility. There have been criticisms which should have been lodged against the law and not the Commission. As it is now, the Commission can say that a rate is unreasonable, but it can not say what the reasonable rate shall be.

This amendment corrects that fatal defect in the original law and clothes the Commission with authority not only to investigate the complaint of the shipper, but, if the rate so complained of is found to be unreasonable, then to say what shall be a reasonable and fairly remunerative maximum rate or charge for the future, and also to make an order requiring the railway or common carrier to make such rate operative within thirty days from the date of the order, thus giving immediate relief to the shipper.

This provision, which authorizes the Commission to make its findings effective by an order, and limiting the time when such order shall become effective to thirty days from the date of its issue, is an important factor in this legislation. Heretofore the burden has been upon the shipper, and he has had to wait in many cases from three to five years before he obtained justice, if at all, and pending review and decision by the courts. But by virtue of this amendatory provision the shipper receives immediate relief to the extent ordered by the Commission, pending an appeal that may be taken to or a review that may be made by the courts. All of this is alike just and safe for both the carrier and the shipper, for it does not deny the right of appeal to the courts. That right continues, and the courts have the power to pass upon the question as to whether the Commission has in a legal manner exercised the authority delegated to it by Congress.

Opposition to this provision on the ground that it is legislation in violation of private or corporate rights—that it takes from the railways the right to manage their own business—is without any real foundation in fact. It does not deprive railway officials of the right to make schedules of transportation rates or charges. It leaves that initial right just where it is now, with the railway officials, and it confirms that right by providing that they shall make and publish schedules of transportation rates and charges, and such schedules shall not be changed except upon thirty days' notice. If such schedules are made reasonable, uniform, and in compliance with law, they have then nothing to fear from this legislation. It does not deprive them of the initial right to make a schedule of rates or charges, but it does, and should, deprive them of the power to make such rates or charges unreasonable or in violation of law. It does, and should, deprive them of the power to make one schedule of rates for some shippers and localities and a different schedule for other shippers and localities for equal service rendered. It does, and should, deprive them of the power to practice discriminations, whether by direct rebates, or by private terminals, or in any other manner.

The purpose of this legislation is not to make and fix specific transportation rates or charges, but to enact a law and establish a procedure whereby such rates or charges shall be reasonable and uniform to all shippers and all localities.

Another important provision of the pending measure is that contained in section 7, amendatory of section 20 of the original act, which amendment authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to require—

Annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and from the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce. * * * To prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the Commission may need information. Such annual reports shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amount paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus funds, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts, and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, equipment, etc.

This provision is important not only for the purpose of placing before the Commission needed information on which to base intelligent action in regulating transportation rates, but also as it may tend to remove what is one of the greatest obstacles to determining actual reasonable transportation rates or charges, namely, overcapitalization.

It has been stated that rate making is the most complicated and difficult work connected with transportation. Doubtless that has been correctly stated, but whether so or not, it certainly is one of the most important. The contention that competition is a regulator of freight rates is not, in the main, tenable. That, by reason of combinations, has gradually ceased to be a controlling factor, and can not now, except in limited and exceptional cases, be depended upon, as controlling in regulating rates.

But whatever may be the difficulties connected with rate making, and wherever may be lodged the power to fix rates, one rule governs—transportation rates should be both reasonable and uniform. It has been uniformly held by the courts and higher judicial tribunals, as interpreting both the common and the statutory law, that transportation rates or charges that affect both the shipper and the carrier should be "reasonable," and "reasonableness" as applied to the schedule of rates or charges has been held to be such rates or charges as are just and will, in the aggregate, yield to the carrier the actual cost of transportation and a reasonable income on the capital invested by the carrier. But this does not mean income on fictitious capital, or overcapitalization. And right here, in overcapitalization, centers one of the greatest obstacles to a satisfactory solution of this problem of rate making.

The tendency in recent years to overcapitalization on the part of many corporations has been pronounced. This get-rich-quick policy has worked and is working an injury not only to the public, but also to corporations as a whole. It has made the people distrustful of corporate influences and doubtful as to corporate securities. But overcapitalization on the part of railways, when practiced, works a double injury to the public. It places in the market stocks of little or doubtful value to be, as has been said, "digested by the public," and at the same time invites corporate officials to establish transportation rates which will yield at least temporary dividends upon such comparatively worthless securities. This is a wrong which should be righted, both for the protection of the people and also for corporations not overcapitalized. It was with that question that the Fifty-seventh Congress attempted to deal when it created the new Department of Commerce and Labor and gave to the Secretary of that Department the right to require reports from corporations of actual assets, capitalization, income, etc.

More explicit and far-reaching, however, is this provision, providing as it does for annual reports, under oath, and incorporating in those reports all the information necessary to the Commission on which to base intelligent action in determining the reasonableness of rates, including the question of capitalization, thus effectively providing for that publicity on which at least may be based not only intelligent action as to the reasonableness of the rate complained of, but a remedy for overcapitalization. Power should be lodged in some commission or some legally constituted body to require capitalization to be based upon actual assets. The enforcement of the above-quoted provision of this law will certainly give to the Commission the power to consider the question of capitalization as affecting the reasonableness of the rates complained of, and will, at least to that extent, correct the evil of overcapitalization; and if to entirely eliminate this evil, as it should be, a still more effective remedy must be provided, this provision will at the very least furnish a basis for intelligently establishing such remedy.

Other provisions of this bill, including that of requiring common carriers to print and keep open to public inspection schedules showing rates and fares charged for transportation of passengers and property; that which makes it unlawful for such common carriers to charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for the transportation of passengers or property than is specified in said published schedule of rates or charges; that which provides penalties and the means for their enforcement for a noncompliance with the orders of the Commission and requirements of the law on the part of the carrier, and also that which increases the number of the Commission from five to seven, and provides that no more than four shall be appointed from the same political party—a most important provision as to number and nonpartisanship—all are important, all in keeping with the purpose of this legislation and for the safeguarding of the vast interests to be affected, protected, and benefited by this proposed enactment.

But it is contended by those who oppose this legislation that the pending measure confers great power on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and therefore it is dangerous and should not become a law. That contention is partly right and partly wrong. That it confers great power on the Interstate Commerce Commission is correct, but that it is dangerous and should not become a law is not correct. This proposed measure does confer great power on that Commission, and that is one of the very purposes of the measure and one of the very reasons why it should be enacted into law. Great power must be lodged somewhere if legislation on this subject is to be effective for remedying existing evils. Where can that power be better lodged or that authority more safely bestowed than upon an Interstate Commerce Commission appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate? The President can be trusted to name, and the Senate to confirm, men who, by character and ability, are worthy the trust imposed in them. The great public, whose interest is affected by this legislation, is not afraid to trust with such authority a Commission so appointed. And, besides, is it not as safe to trust this power and authority with a disinterested, nonpartisan Commission as to leave it where it now largely is—with interested corporation officials? Is it not as safe to delegate this power to an impartial Commission as it is to have one-half of the railway mileage of this nation controlled, as it is authoritatively reported it is controlled, by five interested men? If there is a monopoly of power connected with this subject, I submit it is not that conferred by this measure upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

To base opposition to this legislation on refusal to delegate requisite authority to a responsible Commission is only to invite the continuance of existing evils and to admit an inability to remedy them. This power, great though it may be, must, as above stated, if remedial legislation is to be enacted, be lodged in some representative body, and I believe it can be safely delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission and with a confident assurance that it will be exercised in a manner just alike to individuals, communities, and corporations, and in a way that will be satisfactory to a justly exacting public.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL JUSTIFIED.

Extended argument is not needed to justify Government control of railways engaged in interstate commerce. The very fact that this subject, for the past quarter of a century, has engrossed the thought and discussion of the public and been the subject of repeated legislation on the part of State legislatures and the National Congress, invites the belief and warrants the assertion that Government control is both justified and necessary. The authority for such control is clear and the right to exercise such authority is equally apparent. The objection to Government control in regulating transportation rates that, if carried to its legitimate conclusion, would apply to all business enterprises, is not tenable. Such contention utterly fails to distinguish between private and corporate enterprises, between enterprises of a private nature and those that are public and receive their charter rights from the people, which give them existence and which make them, of right, amenable to the people. Government control is not an attempt to confiscate property rights, neither is it a step toward the mistaken socialistic idea of Government ownership. It is simply the exercise of a right and effort by the legislative body, delegated to it by the Constitution.

The framers of the Constitution, with unerring statesmanship, foresaw the certainty of increasing and expanding commerce, and, with equal foresight, delegated the right to regulate such commerce, so far as it was interstate, to the National Congress. As railways receive their charter rights for State commerce from State legislatures, so they receive, so to speak, their charter rights for interstate commerce from the National Legislature. Government supervision is not an unwarranted interference with private rights, but a justifiable protection of public interests. Keeping pace with our rapidly increasing railway systems and our wonderful industrial and commercial development, has been the increasing necessity both in the true interests of the public and the railways, for Government control.

The President in repeated messages to Congress has ably and urgently recommended the necessity for a reasonable Government control of railways engaged in interstate commerce. In his message to the Fifty-seventh Congress he said:

> The railway is a public servant. Its rates should be just to and open to all shippers alike. The Government should see to it that within its jurisdiction this is so, and should provide a speedy, inexpensive, and effective remedy to that end.

Again, in his message to the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, he said:

> The Government must, in increasing degree, supervise and regulate the workings of the railways engaged in interstate commerce, and such increased supervision is the only alternative between an increase of the present evils on the one hand and still more radical failure on the other.

And still again, in his message to the present Congress, he added:

> It is in the interest of the best type of railway man and the best type of shipper no less than that of the public that there should be Government supervision and regulation of these great business operations. * * * All such legislation frees the corporation that wishes to do well from being driven into doing ill in order to compete with its rivals which prefer to do ill.

These and added utterances of the President favoring Government control of railways engaged in interstate commerce have not only voiced the well-settled convictions of the people, but also invited the cordial approval of some of the most progressive railway officials, who recognize the rights of the people and their contention that Government supervision is reasonable and just.

To assume that this is class legislation, or that it has its inception in hostility to railways, or that it is inspired by prejudice against wealth is alike without foundation and unworthy of serious contention. To assume that such was the motive which prompted and such the purpose of this legislation would be to question the fair-mindedness of the American people and impeach the worthiness of their representatives. This is not, never should be, and never will be a nation of classes. Whether we be rich or poor, whether we live in a palace or a cabin, the way to advancement is open to all. It is in the character, not the fortunes, which men build that they are correctly measured, and he who makes advancement by industrious effort, honest methods, and just regard for the rights of others merits not censure, but commendation.

As with individuals, so with corporations legitimately organized and conducted with a due regard for individual rights and the public welfare. In the progress of our industrial development and the evolution of our business methods corporations and business combinations are recognized as necessary, and are not to be inveighed against simply because they are corporations. Corporations or business combinations which have for their purpose legitimate trade and commerce are not to be condemned, but corporations or combinations which have for their purpose the securing of profits by limiting production, destroying competition, and controlling prices, these are a menace to the public welfare and should be regulated and controlled, and, so far as governments, State or National, have authority, they should exercise that authority for the due protection and welfare of the public.

A pointed illustration of this was that of the so-called "Northern Securities case," a combination of railways for the purpose of preventing competition in railway transportation rates; and equally illustrative of the right and power of the Government to prevent such combinations was the decision in that case by the United States Supreme Court, the effect of which was to dissolve that combination. That decision, made by the highest judicial tribunal in the land, is a complete answer to those who would question the right or the power of the Government to regulate and prevent corporations or combinations from alike disregarding individual rights and the public welfare. That decision, among the most important ever rendered by the Supreme Court, neither threatened business industry nor prosperity, but was a very safeguard for both. It neither licensed reckless attacks upon corporations nor did it permit far-reaching corporations to make combinations in restraint of trade or interstate commerce. It recognized corporations as a necessity in the development of industrial progress, but maintained and forever established the right of the Federal Government to so regulate combinations as to prevent unjust monopoly. It was a wonderful triumph for law and for the President, who directed Government action.

The pending legislation may not be perfect. It may not meet all the requirements demanded by reason of the relationship which exists between common carriers and the public. We have the experience of two decades of attempted legislation on this question to demonstrate its importance and the difficulty of solving the problems it involves. If defects exist in this proposed law, experience can be relied upon to demonstrate what they are, and future Congresses can be depended upon to add the necessary enactments. To hesitate to enact this law by reason of disappointment heretofore or doubt as to the future, would be to impeach all of the past. The people, through their representatives, have solved one great problem after another, and have solved them right. The problem involved in Government control of railways engaged in interstate commerce will be an added problem solved aright; and the pending measure, if enacted into law, will, I believe, stand the reviewing test of judicial tribunals, receive the indorsement of the great conservative business interests of the nation, and merit the approval of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. ADAMSON. And if the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Chairman, does not conclude his remarks within thirty minutes, then I yield to him so much of the succeeding thirty minutes as he may require.

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WILSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. GILFRY, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11263. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay;

H. R. 11045. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania," approved February 21, 1903; and

H. R. 7085. An act authorizing the Pea River Power Company to erect a dam in Coffee County, Ala.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 538. An act for the relief of Charles T. Rader; and

S. 3318. An act to allow the entry and clearance of vessels at San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, and Monterey, Cal.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 4.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into the advisability of establishing a harbor of refuge by the construction of a breakwater on the island of Nantucket, Massachusetts, at or near the westerly side of Great Point, for the commerce and the lessening of the perils of navigation to coastwise traffic in the adjacent waters.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, both the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], the chairman of the committee, and myself yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] such time as he may desire.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not a pleasing position for anyone to occupy who would appear to be in opposition to gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber who, in the ordinary conduct of our national affairs, betray the highest character of wisdom, conservatism, and faithful guardianship of the public interests. One may well doubt his own position when he gets up against the solid mass of that class of matter. None the less, it is the duty of the individual Representative, when he is seized with the conviction that the common weal is imperiled by pending legislation, to have the courage to act out those convictions of individual duty, even if they are not in harmony with those whom he has learned not alone to respect, but to love. One year ago we had before this House a somewhat similar proposition known as the "Esch-Townsend bill." We were urged with speed for the passage of that bill, those opposed to it having less than two hours accorded for the presentation of their views. We were told its immediate passage was demanded for the effect it might have upon the country at large, and especially upon that other body that sits at the other end of the Capitol. Yielding to that public clamor, we passed that measure by practically a unanimous vote, seventeen Members of the House, of which I am proud to say I was one, voting against it.

Less than a year has rolled away, and to-day I make this assertion, and challenge its correctness, that there can not be found in the whole body of this House, outside of the two distinguished gentlemen whose names that bill bore, who would vote for it if it was brought in here at this moment. If one year is sufficient to show you the absolute incorrectness of your position on the other measure, why may we not with confidence hope and believe that if you will take one more year for the consideration of this measure there will not be two found in the House who would vote for this one? Why this unprecedented haste? If war, pestilence, famine, or invasion of our shores were threatened, and the next gale that swept from the North would bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms, then we might have haste and precipitation and then bring pressure upon a dilatory Senate to respond to the will of the people. Two years ago, I think, I might probably have doubted that there could be found upon this side of the Chamber ten men who would have voted for a proposition to take from the business interests of this country the power to fix the price of transportation and confer it upon a body appointed by political power. I doubt if there were ten men who would have voted for such a measure, and yet we have progressed rapidly. This year, with this measure pending, the Republican side seem to have surrendered everything. They gave away, and gave away in order to get a unanimous report from the committee and get for its support the unanimous Democratic side of this Chamber, and so I think our Democratic friends are entitled to a great share of the credit which they claim in bringing this resolution into the House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested yesterday in reading an editorial from one of the ablest Democratic papers in the country, a Democratic paper whose editorial page, I think all men will admit, is as ably edited, as sparkling, bright, and crisp as any of this country, rivaling perhaps the New York Sun in that respect. That is the Washington Post, of this city, a paper owned and controlled in the present day by that light of Democracy, the Hon. John R. McLean, who served as an old-school Democrat, and I want to read to my Democratic friends what Mr. McLean says in this editorial. This is what you will find in that editorial of yesterday morning:

In these days the Democratic banner waves over an eager host of centralizationists. Propositions that tend directly to the extinction of the reserved rights and powers of the States find their most ardent promoters in the party that wears the Democratic name. The most cheerful and hopeful travelers on the road that must, if followed, lead straight on to the commune, to the abolition of the individual and of competition, are shouting Democratic anthems and proclaiming their fidelity to Jefferson and Jackson.

All of which I respectfully submit to my Democratic friends. [Applause.]

Two years ago, or following the strike in the anthracite coal region, Mr. HEARST, a distinguished Member of this House—certainly a distinguished member of your party, whose bill I have heard within the last few moments should have been adopted in the place of all others—declared for the immediate ownership and control of all coal mines. Mr. David Bennett Hill, another distinguished gentleman, who wore a feather on his hat always labeled correctly, declared for the same measure; and no less a distinguished character than the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], introduced a bill into this House, drafted by himself, for the immediate ownership and control of all coal mines and the railroads leading therefrom and appertaining thereto. That measure at that time could not have commanded the support of this side of this body, but we have progressed rapidly. We have got to a point pretty nearly where we are ready to declare for municipal ownership and municipal control of everything and everybody, and that vision which came to Jack Cade in the old days may yet be realized, when he declared that upon his accession to power "then should seven half loaves be sold at the cost of a penny, and every three-hooped pot should have ten hoops, and in all England it should be felony to drink small beer." [Applause.]

We are coming by rapid steps of progression to government ownership. Government control has not exhibited in that portion which has heretofore come under our observation such marvelous performances as to commend it to us. Here in Washington we have presented the best examples afforded of it. We have the Government Printing Office, and there is not a gentleman here who does not know that he could have a speech printed—and I could have this one printed if I wanted to—very much cheaper in a private printing office, probably at a third less than at the Government Printing Office. I am not going to have it printed though at any price. [Applause.] It costs three times more than it would cost at a private or individual outside printing office.

In our Government Gun Factory here in Washington testimony has shown over and over again that 70 per cent of the work upon those guns is done by contract and 30 per cent of the work is performed by the Government, and yet 70 per cent of the cost is represented by the 30 per cent of the work done in the department here in the navy-yard.

If further exhibition were necessary of the waste and the undesirability of the Government entering the realm of industrial enterprise, perhaps the Panama Canal affords as apt and opportune an illustration as any other. I am speaking at random, but I see a gentleman before me who is an authority upon that, if any man in the United States is an authority. I believe the estimated cost of the Nicaraguan Canal was from eighty to one hundred million of dollars by private enterprise. Am I in error? We have bought and paid for the rights of the French company in Panama, and with the money that we have expended it has already cost us 60 per cent of the estimated cost of the Nicaraguan Canal. I do not believe that the charges that have been made of corruption or extravagance are warranted, for I do not believe that under governmental regulation, with the red tape that necessarily exists and the cost that comes to the Government in the performance of all duties, that the expense could have been much less even if angels instead of men had control of it. Why, just the other day we had before this body a measure to expedite the work, to make it possible to build that canal by repeal of the alien labor law, permitting the aliens engaged in manual labor there to work more than eight hours a day, and, if I remember correctly, there were but eight or ten of a majority for the passage of the bill. Oh, some very distinguished gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber begged to be excused, not but that they believed it to be right and proper, but they were afraid of the influence it would have upon the labor unions of their districts and the result of it would be manifest at the polls next November. It was not much of a majority.

No American can or ought to dig that canal with physical labor. The bill did not jeopardize American labor; it did not go so far. It was not a measure of great efficiency, because we did not dare to go far enough to repeal the law which forbids an officer of the American Government working any man, alien or otherwise, more than eight hours. And I believe it is a conclusion that has forced itself into the minds of the thinker and every student of the canal problem, that when we do accomplish this work finally we shall do so through a system of contracts rather than by direct governmental operation.

While there have been abuses under the present system of railway control and management, I believe that for twenty-five years they have been steadily diminishing. Since the passage of the interstate-commerce act, supplemented by the Elkins Act, any man who has given a secret rebate or a rate to one man which was not open to another is a criminal, and if his punishment has not followed it has not been because of the lack of the law, but the lack of the courage, or the inattention and dereliction of the man whose sworn duty it was to punish and to correct that evil.

For the system of rebate no man can offer a defense. It is indefensible in business, it is indefensible in good morals, because if the right be granted to give one man or corporation a rate that is not accorded to every other man or corporation, it is granting to that man or corporation the power to destroy that which never should be granted or permitted to rest in their keeping. That there have been abuses to be corrected I will grant you. If the law has been derelict, how shall those whose sworn duty it was to obey the mandate of the law be held under this measure to stricter accountability than they are to-day?

My friend from Kentucky here, whose scholarship and wisdom and patriotism we all admire, and whose word goes with us all, as it does in Kentucky, asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] last evening a question, and detailed a statement of the affairs existing in eastern Kentucky, which, if true, was revolting to that sense of justice which ought to be in the breast of every true American citizen and every other man, whatever his nationality. As I recollect the statement—for I did not want to interrupt my friend [Mr. PERKINS], because he had only five minutes more before the closing hour——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in that particular instance the producers of ties in the mountains of Kentucky have no redress at all by appealing to the commissioners of my State, for the reason that the owners of the ties desire to ship them into other States. Now, I would like the gentleman from Pennsylvania to state, first, whether or not that condition ought to be remedied, and if it ought to be, what the remedy should be.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, if I knew what the remedy was and how it ought to be applied, I would be a wiser man than any man I have seen recently. Railroad people have been grappling with this problem, and so have the Interstate Commission, and bright men in this House on both sides of the Chamber for a great many years. But it occurred to me this way, just looking at it from a business standpoint. If I understood your question to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS], and the statement of facts, it was that men living in the mountain districts of Kentucky were engaged in cutting railway ties, and the roads had put the rates so high that those ties could not be shipped, making it practically confiscatory of those ties to take them to market; and that when they protested, the railroad said: "We want to use these ties ourselves at some later period." Now, granting that that is exactly the situation that occurred, I want to appeal to some gentlemen who are lumbermen and business men, and if I am mistaken I wish they would correct me.

I think an 8-inch railroad tie of green oak would weigh something like 300 pounds, and that the ordinary wagonload is 8, 10, or 11, at the most, of these ties, weighing 300 pounds each. Now, then, a man in the mountains of Kentucky wishes to sell them to some other transportation company a distance of 200 or 300 miles off the line of this road, and he applies for a rate. He is given a rate, we will say, of 8 cents a hundred pounds. I believe gentlemen would recognize that 8 cents a hundred pounds would not be an excessive rate to a point some 200 miles off. That would make the cost of each tie 24 cents for transportation. I think that the average price of the tie to the railroad is about 45 cents. That would leave the man but 21 cents for his tie, which would be confiscatory to him; and yet that 300 pounds could not be shipped for less.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, why can not the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company ship ties at the same price it ships other lumber and timber?

Mr. SIBLEY. In answer, I must say I do not know. You have not given me the schedules on lumber and timber.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I understand the price on ties is three or four times what the price is for the average freight on ordinary lumber. The discrimination against ties is simply by reason of the fact that they want to use those ties at some future period in the repair of their own road.

Mr. SIBLEY. There is nothing heavier, for the number of feet of lumber that it contains, that sells so cheaply as a railroad tie. Its total value is 45 cents; its weight, approximately, 300 pounds; therefore, it can not bear transportation to any great distance; and it is to be presumed that if the protest was made that it was confiscatory, that the railroad manager would say, "Well, that is the rate; we can not ship it for less; but you hold your ties for a time, we will need them and take them ourselves, and use them on the line of our own road." That would be the answer he would give to that proposition.

Mr. Chairman, in this measure now under consideration it seems to me we are invading the realm of socialism. This bill should be properly termed "A bill to fix rates by political agencies," and, in the language of another, "To establish the business of transportation by lawsuit." You have got to commence with a legal decision at the beginning, and you have got to take it at every point along to the very end of the chapter. If I construe it rightly that is the effect of it. If you yield to the sentiment that is coming up to-day—and we have had the warnings that worse is to follow—if you yield to-day to Mr. HEARST and Mr. Bryan, who declare that they support this measure, not as a panacea, not as a cure for all evils, but that they have indorsed it as a step in the right direction toward government ownership—if you yield to this sentiment, you must realize in what direction you are going.

This current of socialism has become so rampant in this country that within the past week Mr. Jack London, whose books we have all read with interest, is reported as having said from a public platform in the city of New York that the time had come for the division of all property and the use of so much force and the shedding of so much blood as should be necessary thereto. I am not to be stampeded by the desires of men who are looking at it merely from the standpoint of State socialism. And without any disrespect to my friends who favor this bill, because I guess you all do [laughter], I want to paraphrase the language of Horace Greeley. I will not paraphrase it exactly, but I think it could well be paraphrased in this wise:

"Not all men supporting this bill are socialists and anarchists, but every socialist and every anarchist in this nation does indorse this bill, the product of your creation."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIBLEY. I yield to my friend.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is using the term "socialism" quite frequently. I should like to ask him this question: In the case of the street-car system of the city of Washington, does the gentleman believe that Congress ought to say what that street-car system shall be allowed to charge for fares; that it ought by statute to say that the street-car company shall give transfers at certain points; that they shall give commutation rates—that is, if you buy six tickets you shall only pay a quarter for them? Do you think that the use of the epithet "socialism" and the application of it to the men who vote for that sort of thing ought to deter them from voting for it? And if it is right in the case of a street-car system, which is essentially monopolistic in so far as the municipality is concerned, wherein does that sort of legislation differ in principle from the Government regulating interstate commerce over railroads, which are in themselves monopolistic of that traffic?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, my friend is well recognized by all of us as a very eminent legal light, and I can not enter the realm of discussion of legal propositions with him. I am going to attempt to look at it from a business standpoint and not discuss the legal phase or the rights that might exist. Unquestionably the right does exist. You claim it as a constitutional right, through that article of the Federal Constitution which declares that Congress shall have the right to regulate and control commerce between the States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The question that I put was this: Does the gentleman think that Congress ought by law to fix the rates or tariffs that street-car systems shall be permitted to levy upon passengers in the District of Columbia, in the city of Washington? If so, wherein does that kind of legislation differ in principle from the proposed legislation which attempts to fix a just rate upon interstate railroads, they being just as monopolistic of that traffic as the street-car company is monopolistic of the passenger traffic in the municipality? I was speaking of the principle, and whether the gentleman favors its application in the one case, and if so, why he does not favor its application in the other.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, there are many different questions involved in the one, but I will state that I believe Congress is really the town council of the city of Washington, its board of aldermen, and possibly its mayor as well, and in that capacity the regulation of street-car fares within the District of Columbia has been committed to it, and I presume that it is within the province of this House and its right to establish whatever conditions it sees fit to impose that are legal and constitutional.

Now, gentlemen, I am not looking into the faces of a rabble of uneducated and ignorant men. There is not a man here into whose face I look that is not familiar with the conditions which led to the writing of that clause in the Federal Constitution. You know as well as I do that fifty years antedating the birth of the American railway volume after volume was written, during the Revolutionary war and subsequent thereto, until the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and that this was the main issue that filled the pamphlets of all the pamphleteers, the newspapers, and the public discussion. That was because New York was laying duties on the products of Staten Island and portions of New Jersey and erecting a customs barrier against goods which came from Connecticut. It was under the claim that we should be merged into one greater whole with great aims and aspirations and be a great nation and not a combination of petty principalities that the article was written there, that you and I might move our property undaunted, and not be kept out by customs barriers and customs officers.

Mr. JAMES. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SIBLEY. I do.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. The gentleman has told us that this measure tends to socialism and that Bryan is its leader. He has said that Bryan supports it not merely because it is right, but because it tends toward Government ownership of railroads. It is also said that his party is quite near unanimous in the support of this measure, and therefore he stands almost single and alone. I wish to ask him to enlighten this House as to the means employed whereby the whole Republican party has right about faced and is following William J. Bryan—the one you hailed as an anarchist, seeking to destroy. You now rush to his doctrine as the one which saves and redeems. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIBLEY. Will my friend excuse me for putting the responsibility of answering onto broader and abler shoulders than my own among my colleagues? [Laughter.] I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that he need not shake his gory locks at me. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. I want to say to the gentleman that my locks are nearly as absent as his. [Laughter.] I might suggest to the gentleman that if he wants the burden taken off his shoulders, that perhaps the Republicans have had their ears to the ground on this great railroad question and heard from the people.

Mr. SIBLEY. The answer is not up to the gentleman who has the floor at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, it would seem that all representatives of the highest ideals of development of our civil life who represent the civic virtues could be guided by these monuments, these beacon lights which human history and experience have erected all along the shores of time. It seems unfortunate, but nevertheless it is a fact, stated to be such, that never yet was the child born on all this earth that would ever believe the fire was hot until it stuck its fingers into it.

New Zealand many years ago, perhaps under conditions similar to those now confronting us, thought there should be given to a political commission power to establish rates for transportation in that country. The right was granted, but then it proved but the one spark of fire that lighted the whole train that followed. From the commission given the authority to establish rates there came every sort of abuse in that country, and protests of the patrons and the people until in New Zealand they purchased the railways. And upon that purchase disaster followed disaster; or it may be that it was the evolution of things. It is according to how far a man has become imbued with socialistic virus.

One of the main adjuncts to great political power is the authority to control the railways of the nation and its employees. The men or party having that power would be ambitious, and, seeing their opportunity to protect themselves through years to come, they failed not to take advantage of their opportunity. They then passed a law making it compulsory upon the government of New Zealand to find employment for all unemployed labor; to establish governmental banks, and decreed that any man, however indigent, could borrow at least $50 from the government; to declare for old-age pensions, and indigent pensions to be given not under the operation of any universal law, but by a commission appointed by the prime minister, and I am confident that these appointments went where they would do the most good politically. [Laughter.] Then, to throw a sop to the farmers, they decreed that whenever any twelve farmers petitioned for a creamery or a butter factory it should be established, if the cost was not exceeding $8,000.

And when there came to the prime minister the people protesting that under their progressive land tax and their progressive income tax they were being denuded of all their possessions, the prime minister, Mr. Seddon, said, in answer to them, these words: "That is the object of this legislation—that there shall remain in all New Zealand neither a rich man nor a poor man." So the forces have swept on until they are in the throes of state socialism, and they are going to make a glorious success of it just as long as there remains in pockets of thrift and industry one dollar to be wrung out in the form of taxation. Then there comes, as the sequence to the socialistic state, the state of anarchy, and then the reign of terror, and then the swing of the pendulum to the other side, and the strong man on horseback. In all human history that has been the experience, and society has been forced to rebuild its shattered superstructure upon those foundations which guarantee the rights of persons and of property.

Passing from New Zealand, a country self-governed, where political power could exert itself in government control, let us look at Germany—Germany, the most highly educated nation perhaps upon the globe, having a bright people, a progressive people, and an industrious and sober people. In 1878 Bismarck declared that it was necessary that the Government should take over the ownership of the German railways in order that through control of rates it might be possible to decentralize and unify the German Empire. And right here, for fear I shall forget it, at the last diet there appeared before that diet the prime minister, declaring that it was necessary to build a canal to unite the waters at the head of navigation on the Elbe and the Rhine and to extend their systems of canals through the Empire, that the German Empire might be decentralized and unified. So, in autocratic Germany, with the people educated through the centuries with respect for their rulers, it has been found absolutely impossible to establish rates for transportation except on one basis, and that the hard and fast basis of distance and cost of service. Under the operation of that law communities have been built up and cities have been destroyed. Bremen, once a prosperous port, has seen her wharves rotting or idle and her freight and commerce transferred to Hamburg.

In Germany, a country not very much greater, if any, than some of the States in our Federal Union, we find the people dissimilar and as sectional as though they were distant nations. In eastern Germany the products can not find an outlet to western Germany. The wheat and sugar of eastern Germany come down the Elbe and around by the ocean and up the Rhine to find their market at Hamburg, or their wheat goes down the Danube, through the Black Sea, around the Mediterranean, and up the Atlantic coast, and find their market at the miller's door on the Elbe or the Rhine. Germany exports from her eastern borders every year to Norway, Sweden, and England, under an export bounty, several hundred thousand tons of wheat and rye and barley, and under an import duty of 35 marks, or about $8.75 a ton, she imports more than 2,500,000 tons of wheat into the Rhenish provinces. That little country finds that she can not transport her product from one section to the other, and pay the railway tolls demanded under Government control and direction.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Why?

Mr. SIBLEY. Ah, my friend, I am glad this question has been asked. I will tell you why. I read from Von Thielen, minister of public works:

> Under existing railway tariffs 125 miles appear to be the distance that grain can be transported by rail for domestic consumption, and that for many purposes of trade eastern Germany and the Rhenish provinces are farther apart than Germany from New York or Buenos Ayres.

Germany has three great iron districts, the Ruhr, the Saar, and the district of Silesia, in the southeastern portion. The Saar district, one of the greatest iron districts of all Europe, is 220 miles distant from the Ruhr district. And yet each of these districts finds its zone beyond which it can not ship its products by rail. Except as water communication is afforded them, they are not shipped, although but 225 miles distant, and the smelters of the Ruhr district needing the iron of the Saar district. Only the most expensive and carefully selected iron, that can bear the cost of railway transportation, is shipped. While the coke traffic between them amounts to 1,250,000 tons by water, only 25,000 tons are shipped by rail.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Is not that in harmony with the gentleman's first proposition, by reason of the expense incidental to the Government operating an enterprise of that sort? Now, do we not seek to avoid that by leaving the operation and the control of the railroads in this country in the hands of the owners and not putting it in the hands of the Government; and does not that argument react against the position the gentleman takes?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will say to my friend that I think within a minute I will come to the portion of my subject that will, perhaps, answer him; if not, I will ask him to repeat it. I want to keep on with this thought.

Those districts have their territory, and the products of one can not invade the other; and in a statement made by one of the ministers of the German Empire he stated that it was operating like a system of customs barriers about the different sections of Germany. And that is why, in the last Diet, the request was made for the money to build these waterways that they might accomplish what Bismarck sought to do in 1878—the decentralization of these sections and the unification of Germany. But every time they came up against this political proposition that these provinces must come to the support of the rulers, so even in the German Empire political considerations have influenced the establishment of rates as they certainly would if this legislation became effective. The section of country possessing advantages of location determined to maintain the advantage.

Mr. MANN. The rates in Germany are absolute rates, fixed by the Government?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Below which the products can not be carried. The territory is circumscribed in Germany because the Government will not carry the products as cheaply as a private corporation probably would be glad to carry them.

Mr. SIBLEY. I think that is right.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman find anything in this bill which would prevent a railroad company from carrying products as far as it pleases and as cheaply as it pleases?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask my friend if he will wait until a little further along in my remarks, when I will try to make clear why it appears to me so. I may be in error, as I generally am.

Mr. MANN. It would be very rare if the gentleman is in error.

Mr. SIBLEY. The people producing iron in the Rhur district came to the Government and demanded lower rates on their ores. Von Maybach, minister of public works in 1899, said this:

> The inability to make lower rates was due to the unwillingness of the Government to prefer the Ruhr to other iron-producing centers. It would not do to give one district rates which would allow it to grow more rapidly than another district. Equal treatment must be accorded to all. Moreover, the Government could not make reductions that would expose it even to the suspicion of preferring one district.

Then later Von Miquel, one of the greatest ministers of finance Germany has ever had, except and alone Bismarck, said:

> Summing up the situation, it would appear impossible to retain state ownership of the railways unless it should be made practicable to make rates in accordance with hard and fast rules such as those made upon the cost of service.

And again:

> The system of government ownership must break down unless it finds refuge from the conflict of local and sectional interests.

This was supplemented by a report of the commission appointed by the ministers to investigate railroad affairs, where they say in the report:

> Any system which takes into account else but the cost of service will precipitate a measureless conflict of interest and put the whole system into the domain of politics and array section against section, farmer against trader, and trader against manufacturer.

So Germany, instead of being unified, has been divided and they have been building and developing their canal system. Two great rivers—the Elbe and the Rhine—run almost parallel, constituting the great central arteries of transportation. Germany has been developing her canals. Last year they voted ten millions to build a canal from Berlin to Stettin, 100 miles distance, already connected by a railroad with abundant facilities for transportation; and now, that Berlin may reach that point, they are building a canal costing $10,000,000, while that railroad last year transported but 200,000 tons of freight, less than is sent by one concern from my home town in Pennsylvania.

What has been the experience in France? Practically the same. The French commission, in order to protect their canals and their waterways, by ministerial decree ordered that the railroads should not fix rates within 20 per cent of the price of water tolls. They had to have a law to prevent the railways competing with the canals.

In Italy, where the control of rates is fixed, and the Government controls all of the railways and owns a majority of them, the Italian commissioner summed up the conditions in that country by saying:

> It is a mistake to expect lower rates or better facilities from government than from private companies. The actual results are just the reverse. The state is more apt to tax industry than to foster it, and when it attempts to tax industry it is even less responsible than a private company. Second. State management is more costly than private management, and a great deal of capital is thus wasted. Third. Political considerations are brought into a system of state management in a way which is disastrous to legitimate business and demoralizing to politics.

To-day, under the development of the American railway transportation system, a carload of wheat is shipped from the Mississippi River and laid down on the docks at Liverpool cheaper than the English road charges for taking it from London to Liverpool, a distance of 210 miles. Under this development it has been said by no less an authority than Professor Hadley, of Yale, that the cost of transporting the wheat in a loaf of bread from Dakota to New York City is less than the cost to the baker delivering it from his shop four blocks distant to his morning customer.

This American railway system is not perfect, but it is working so far toward perfection that it is the admiration of all of the railway men of the world. This system, while it has not been responsible for all our growth and progress and development, is entitled to its fair share of credit as one of the chief factors incident thereto.

Gentlemen speak of the rights and privileges they have conferred upon the railways as one of the reasons why they should become subject to Federal control, and because we have granted them rights to build across our territory and public lands. Mr. Chairman, I am not the oldest Member of this House, except in appearance. There are men whose hair is grayer than mine, and there are some whose hair is darker than mine, who can remember when we talked about the building of a great transcontinental line about as we would to-day a proposition to establish a line of air ships between New York and Liverpool. It was a matter for the far-distant future. While we admitted it might be a military necessity and justifiable upon those grounds, what man ever dreamed of seeing it become one of the great arteries and highways of American commerce, to be duplicated over and over again?

I have ridden for a hundred miles across the plains of Kansas before the ballast was laid, where you would not see, outside of the house of the section man, a single habitation. It was a wilderness as barren as it came from the hands of its Creator. To-day you ride through fertile fields and through orchards with golden fruitage. Through your State of Minnesota and yours of Illinois I have seen in my day lands increase from $10 an acre to $100 and $150 an acre, and I guess they are cheap at that. The reason for this is that you enjoyed, with me in Pennsylvania, the facility afforded by the enterprise and push and genius of American railway management, of marketing your goods almost as cheaply as I could market mine. And while in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio our farms and our buildings and our improvements have declined since 1880 $326,000,000, yours have gone up and increased into the billions, and we say, "God bless you; we are glad of it."

The rate from my town to seaboard is 16 cents a hundred, and yet last year the rate on wheat from the Mississippi, and the rate the year before—I think I am correct—was but 14½ cents a hundred pounds to New York. It was a cent and a half a hundred less than mine. Is there a man who believes it is possible for any other rate than the distance rate? If I understood my friend from Missouri correctly, I understood him to say that it was the only fair rate. You can not have any other rate, nor will you have any other rate under this law, in my judgment, except that based upon the "cost of service" and distance. I know it is an unpopular thing to say, "We will charge what the traffic will bear," but that has been the foundation and keynote of our commercial and industrial development. The railroad has been ready to meet the producer more than halfway in finding an outlet for his products. Upon what principle has the Interstate Commerce Commission decided all of its cases? I want to quote the language exactly. Not once, but over and over again, this has been the exact verbiage of their opinions:

> Each locality or section is entitled of natural right to the advantages of trade or industry accruing to it by reason of its geographical position.

That the Interstate Commerce Commission which is going to interpret and execute your law; to whose hands you are committing this tremendous power. They are to emphasize the experience of France and Italy and Germany and Australia and every country and people of the globe where a rate-making policy by government has been attempted. I can see no justice in a system that does not take into consideration the cost of the service. Living, as I do, 500 miles from New York, is it just to me, when I ship to New York at the rate of 16 cents a hundred, that a man who lives three times as far, on the Mississippi, or four times as far, on the Missouri, or six times as far distant, out in Dakota, should expect and receive the same rate that I, through my proximity to market, receive?

I would complain at once to the Interstate Commerce Commission under this law that that was an unjust discrimination against me, living in Pennsylvania in close proximity to the market. The Interstate Commerce Commission would be bound to declare that it was unjust and discriminatory that a man living in the Dakotas or Mississippi Valley should have an equal rate, and would order my freight to be reduced in proportion, say, to 4 cents a hundred. The Supreme Court would declare that confiscatory. If they were to make it 8 cents a hundred it would be confiscatory. But say they will establish it at 10 cents a hundred—for certainly that is not unreasonable, for grain has been shipped from the Mississippi at 14 cents a hundred—then what happens? If for 500 miles of service 10 cents a hundred is reasonable, then——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended ten minutes.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps the Chairman was not in the chair, but I understood that I was to have liberty to conclude my remarks.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only limitation upon the gentleman is his own good judgment and good sense. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, who is always chivalric in his treatment of his colleagues, was kind enough to say to me that he did not want to cut me short, but that he was under some pretty pressing obligations to gentlemen on that side and hoped that I would not exceed one hour and a quarter, if I could help it. But inasmuch as on this bill there has been no division of time between those in favor of it and those few opposing it, the gentlemen in charge of the bill have been kind enough and fair enough to express a willingness that I should have such time as I needed, even if I could not agree with them, because of the limitations of mental ability or capacity.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. One other question. I will ask the gentleman if he thinks the Interstate Commerce Commission would, under this bill, still adhere to the ruling heretofore announced in face of the fact that the Supreme Court has overruled them, and had decided that that measure of procedure was illegal.

Mr. SIBLEY. There is no question whatever. Each decision, I take it, that has been made has not been a broad and sweeping decision. I would rather you asked that question of some good lawyer, like my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], or the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], who is going to debate the legal propositions. I am trying to apply what little business sense I have acquired during a number of years that I have been in business. Six years ago I retired from business, and now I am about to go out of public life.

Mr. MANN. Much to our regret. [Loud general applause.]

Mr. SIBLEY. It is very kind of you to say so. I was trying to bring to the consideration of this subject the ripened wisdom or information which has gravitated to me from observation of some things that have occurred and knowledge that has come to me as a shipper and one who has been in close touch with business affairs, that there can be no other basis than the basis of distance and cost of service, if we do justice to all sections without fear or favor. If there is any other disposition made to establish rates it will lead to a struggle between rival sections of this country which will make the struggle between the North and the South over the slave question seem insignificant. Then we will have Senators from Pennsylvania contesting with Senators from New York for the power that they can exercise to control the Commission. You will have Senators from Maryland contesting with New York Senators and New England Senators for their particular locality and ports for which they are responsible. So with Louisiana and Texas; so with South Carolina and Georgia. The Senators that represent those different Commonwealths will be found in competition with each other. If you commence to apply any rule, you have got to apply a rule that is absolutely just. What is the cost of service and what is the distance traversed? You can not apply a rule and make the American people conform to a rule which is not based on absolute and equal justice to all.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIBLEY. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. Is it not a fact that this bill attempts to do that very thing, to give to some commission the right to review the action of a railroad company when it makes a ruling and makes a rate that is not dependent upon the distance and the cost, but upon some other consideration?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the inexorable laws of trade and of competition will establish at last either a modus vivendi or it may be a status quo; I do not know the exact term, but you lawyers and diplomats can figure that out. But somewhere there comes an armed neutrality after the war and rate conflict and struggle for supremacy between rival corporations and rival communities; there comes a fixed price for charges established either by common consent or by common experience, and they have got to make the best of them.

All this trouble springs mainly not from individual shippers, because the Interstate Commerce Commission not once, but over and over again, have said that as a whole rates are not excessive upon American railways; but the complaints have originated from communities—of the preferential or the differential. When the Soo Canal was built, opening up the waterways and making possible the passage of the largest ships into Lake Superior, the wheat that formerly came to Milwaukee and made it the foremost wheat market on this continent ceased to come there. It went around through these waterways, and Minneapolis was sending her wheat and her flour out through the highway of the Great Lakes. The railways lost their traffic, and in order to compete with that waterway they reduced their rates on wheat and flour for export or for domestic markets. The result was that no more wheat came to Milwaukee, and she, seeing that she was not getting the wheat, complained of those rates, and so there started the rivalry between Milwaukee and Minneapolis and between Minneapolis and Duluth as to merchandising; and so it has been all over the Federal Union; Charleston, angry because she is not a basing point, Savannah getting the advantage.

My friend the gentleman from Missouri spoke about these basing points as a great evil, and that they tend to build up great cities, great centers where there are slums, and where crime prevails. Unquestionably one of the phenomena of our civilization is the great urban growth, and unquestionably the railways have been measurably responsible for it. Now, in modern days the merchant gets right next door to the merchant who is in the same line of goods. In the old days he used to think he wanted to get as far away as he could. Manufacturing interests centralize for the benefit of whatever rates may be obtained, either by rail or by water, from those competitive points, and so has come this urban growth.

If I understand the basing, or basic point, system (if I am incorrect I will be very glad for my friend from Illinois to correct me, for I know he has given more study to it than I have), I will take, for instance, Atlanta, Ga. We will see whether the complaint that there should not be a greater charge for a shorter distance is correct. We will say that the rate from New York to Atlanta is 30 cents per hundred, while at some point 100 miles this side of Atlanta there is no basing point. We call it Smithville. Now, the rate to Smithville from New York is 75 cents a hundred in less than carload lots. There is not a gentleman here who does not know that economy of transportation comes from the ability to carry great quantities. You can carry a carload or a trainload at a per hundred for a small per cent of what you can if you are moving only an individual hundredweight.

And so the rate of local merchandise to Smithville, 100 miles distant from Atlanta, is 75 cents a hundred. Therefore a merchant going to New York and buying 300 pounds of dry goods and 300 pounds of groceries, instead of shipping to Smithville, ships directly through to Atlanta at the 30-cent rate and pays the local rate back to Smithville of 20 cents, and so it costs him 50 cents a hundred, or $3, to lay his goods down in Smithville. Now, then, he saves 25 cents a hundred over the local rate from New York to Smithville. But what about the man 100 miles south of that basing point? He pays his 30 cents a hundred plus the Atlanta rate of 20 cents a hundred, and he has had his freight carried 200 miles farther than the man in Smithville at the same price. The railway companies have thought it wise that all freight going into these zones within the radius of these towns could be shipped in carload loads, and so they take them in carload loads and then distribute them from these basing points. It is apparent that they could thus make the rate lower for all the communities than they could under any other system.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SIBLEY. I do.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say to the gentleman that the case that he puts is the very one that the Supreme Court of the United States considered in the Social Circle case in the shipping of buggies from Cincinnati to Augusta. They made the freight lower to Augusta than it was to Social Circle, Augusta being 120 miles farther from Atlanta than Social Circle or from Cincinnati, and the Supreme Court held that the railroad did not violate the provisions of the long and short haul clause. This bill does not interfere with the long and short haul clause as it is now written.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will say to my friend from Georgia that that is a matter of profound regret to me. I heard expressed to-day by a gentleman who served on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee a profound regret that the gentlemen could not agree among themselves. They are all agreed upon one issue. I do not want to repeat myself, but I can recollect a similar instance when there was an agreement between men, about the time that one of the greatest wrongs was perpetrated that ever was perpetrated in human history, and it is recorded in these words: "And Pilate and Herod were made friends from that day." [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope my friend does not propose to be so sacrilegious as to compare the railroads to Christ.

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, no, my friend. The proudest and richest man is entitled just as much to his share of protection as the poorest object that walks this earth, and the poorest object has as much right to his share of justice as the proudest and richest man.

Mr. BARTLETT. And no more.

Mr. SIBLEY. And no more. The wrong done one man, whether he is rich or poor, is a wrong done to our common brotherhood of man.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, will the gentleman permit me to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield further to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want my friend to understand what I said, that this bill does not change the existing law in the act of 1887, as it has been construed by the Supreme Court upon the subject of the long and short haul. None of us claim that it does. I say to him frankly that I as one of the minority tried to change it, but I did not succeed.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will say to my friend from Georgia that there were some questions asked yesterday by a very able gentleman, whom I do not see present now, one for whose ability I have great respect, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and I found that he could not agree with some of them, and where lawyers can not agree, what folly and presumption it would be for us ordinary individuals to enter. I can not enter it. I must keep out of that realm, and shall not attempt to enter it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will say to the gentleman that I think the legal profession has missed a great deal because he did not enter it.

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, my friend is complimentary and is always partial. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, in Germany the manufacturers of iron have waited upon the German Emperor and told him that except they can receive a reduction equal to 66 per cent of the railway tariff that they will be driven out of that portion of Germany's iron market where the American products can compete.

The cost of transportation in every ton of pig iron made in Germany represents 30 per cent of the entire cost; in the United States, if my figures are correct, I think about 6 per cent. Now, my friends in Pittsburg and some other manufacturing centers will find this condition, that as in Germany or in any other country where the hard and fast system of distance and cost of service must prevail in order to obtain justice to each individual and each community, there will be certain zones across which their products can not go, whether those products be the wheat and corn of Dakota or the cotton and the iron and the magnificent productions in fruit and forests of the southland. Each will find his zone, beyond which he can not go. Within the last week there has been made a rate on oranges from California, including fast schedules, icing charges, and ocean transportation, of $1 a box to London. A box of oranges weighs 80 pounds.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes; certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. Can the gentleman inform me whether or not those same oranges can be shipped at that rate from California to New York?

Mr. SIBLEY. I think 80 cents is the rate to New York. That is my understanding.

Mr. STANLEY. I am asking only for information.

Mr. SIBLEY. While from Florida, only a third of the distance, the rate to New York is 60 cents a box, if I recollect. Now, that would look discriminatory. From California those oranges must cross three ranges of mountains, they must come through the canyon passes, over the curvature and the gradients of three great ranges of mountains, while from Florida they will traverse an almost flat and straight line.

As I say, that looks like discrimination as against Florida, but it possibly is not altogether so, for the reason that Florida oranges come earlier to the American market, and that market absorbs them, and that rate has been made on the oranges from California, which are now greater in production than our home consumption, that they may reach the markets of the world and compete with the oranges of the Mediterranean. The railway, looking selfishly to its own interest, has found its interest to lie along the line of the greatest good to its patrons as a rule. Last summer I was a member of the committee which paid a visit to the opening of the exposition at Portland. While there, in talking with the general superintendent of the Northern Pacific Railway, he told us that they were giving a rate on lumber from Portland to the points east over the Cascade range of mountains and the Rocky Mountain range at 5 mills a ton per mile, while the company charged itself 6 mills a ton per mile for carrying the commodities that it needed in its own operations, and they had figured that possibly they were carrying that lumber at a loss. Certainly it was a close question whether it was a loss or a profit. For what reason? "Why," he said, "for selfish reasons; because those cars by going back laden instead of empty and taking that lumber will build up the communities and develop the interests and industries along that line, and we are like the man throwing bread upon the waters in the hope that after many days it shall return."

And when I think of the development of the Far West I am reminded of what a friend of mine said to-day, that when Moses smote the rock he did not indicate any more sublime faith than did these men who crossed the desert wastes and mountain ranges, who spanned the chasms and overcame the difficulties that were presented in building the lines of railroad to the Pacific coast. They were the old men who planted the trees in the orchard of life that another and later generation might eat the fruit thereof. The history of every railway of the pioneer class is a record of bankruptcies and receiverships and ruin to stockholders. If there be an exception, I do not recall it. You speak of overcapitalization. I read the speech of my eloquent and able friend from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and it seemed to me as though it was going to be a sort of hedge, so that you could get out of the distance and cost of service proposition by showing overcapitalization, and I desire to direct attention to just one remark which struck me as very singular. I read from his speech:

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This is the Nebraska case I am reading from, so that, if I understand the gentleman correctly, the rates must be practically confiscatory before the court would be authorized to interfere.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The court undoubtedly is trying to stretch the doctrine of confiscation to cover "reasonable returns."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not have much respect for courts that stretch doctrines or do anything else than administer the plain terms of the law. I do not want a commission to stretch doctrines. I would grant this Commission power to put in the penitentiary for life any man who gave a rebate or a preference to one individual over an American railway that it did not give to every other individual under similar circumstances, and then I would make it a penitentiary offense for any man to accept or receive such a benefit. [Applause.] He is the man chiefly at fault and principally guilty—the recipient is the man that committed the crime and demanded the bribe.

Fix your law making it a crime punishable by imprisonment and a fine of even $100,000 to give a man a rebate. Make every employee or official of the transportation company, or employee or official of a firm or corporation who receives that rebate, a party criminal, if he, having knowledge, conceals such a crime. Give to the informer one-half of the fine so levied, and I will undertake to say there is not a transportation company on this continent who would take the risk of having itself blackmailed, or going to the penitentiary staring it in the face, with five or six thousand employees knowing the fact that there had been rebates given. Draw your bill as drastically as you please; make it even to the taking away of the charter of the transportation company; draw it along the lines of regulating icing charges, discrimination, or rebate, and I will be with you on every proposition but the one main proposition, that there shall be delegated to a commission appointed by political agencies and more or less influenced thereby a power greater than was ever granted to a potentate or ruler on this earth—the power to legislate, to construe judicially, and to execute.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will.

Mr. MARTIN. Is it not true that what is known as the Elkins law, as far as criminal penalties are concerned, about as thoroughly covers the question of rebates and discrimination as a statute could be drawn?

Mr. SIBLEY. Granting that is true, and I think the gentleman's statement is correct, then there is one of two other things equally true. Either there do not exist violations or officials charged with responsibility of prosecution of offenders are derelict in their duty, and it is your province and mine to force them to action.

Mr. MARTIN. I think one of the strongest points in favor of this present legislation is that it is proposed to afford a quick remedy at hand for anyone aggrieved to compel the enforcement of the present laws against discriminations and rebate, and if I understand the argument of the gentleman it is chiefly addressed against that provision in the bill that gives power to the Commission to fix a maximum rate. My own judgment is it is practically impossible to make a criminal statute so strong that it can be a practical working statute in the face of great profits in an industry, and that large interests will take chances of criminal prosecution and the tiring out by appeals to courts of their weaker antagonists.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will say to my friend this: If you made a few striking and notable examples of men, however strongly fortified they may be financially or politically, or how powerfully they are intrenched, it seems to me of all the men those are the men who should be held up as examples, and we must not plead in this twentieth century of our civilization that we must legislate because there is somebody powerful enough and big enough to break through the law. If this is the case, why do you write this law on the statute books? I will agree with my friend in one thing. I am willing somebody besides the railroads shall have power to fix rates, but I want that power fixed with a more responsible authority—the Supreme Court of the United States or the United States courts. I do not want a political body, which always has been and always will be a political body, to have the power to fix those rates.

To my friends of the South—I am going to be a Southerner myself one of these days. [Applause.] When I go through the South and see the magnificent territory and its vast wealth in iron, minerals, and cotton, forest, forage, and fruitage, with the magnificent possibilities that are going to come to that country with greater transportation facilities and a solution of the labor problem and some other problems, I am willing to grant for argument that this legislation will not hurt you one particle; but what you need now is more abundant facilities for getting your products to market and opening up and developing that country. Do you not believe, following the natural business instinct that a man of common sense and business training possesses, that he will wait until he can ascertain how this law is going to work? As wise men these railroad men would wait. Any man schooled and trained in business methods will wait, the same as if there was a tariff bill impending. It is not the evil of any tariff primarily that causes men to distrust and fear it, but the hesitation before it becomes effective, and the waiting for a year or two afterwards to find out what the effects are in practice, that causes possibly more distress and stagnation than the reduction in rate.

If there is going to be a tariff change, the merchants do not buy, manufacturers do not produce, and industries become stagnant. And so in this until it can be demonstrated that these evils which I fear—evils that the railway people fear—do not exist, and that they are being alarmed unduly, all industry and development will necessarily halt.

Now, I profoundly and sincerely hope that I am mistaken and unduly alarmed about the consequence of this bill. I hope that it does not open the door of socialism; that it is not responsive to a clamor that is going up and down the nation and which has resulted in almost giving the political control of New York City to one who declares for municipal ownership. I hope that this is not a step in the development of the theories so magnificent and glorious as outlined by Mr. Jack London; but I fear that it is a step in that direction. And therefore I trust through the orderly processes of courts of law, commanding the respect and confidence of all men, there may be the judicial determination of the reasonableness of a rate rather than by a body of men who have exercised such power in the past.

And, Mr. Chairman, if this measure shall receive the concurrent action of that body that sits at the other end of the Capitol, if there shall be given to a commission the power to construe and legislate and execute, I should love to see the committee recede from their determination to accept no amendment, and accept one that I should like to offer. And that is an amendment fixing the salaries of those seven men and fixing their term of service for life or good behavior.

I would like to see the salaries of the members of that Commission fixed at $15,000 a year, and the salary of the chairman at $25,000, in order that we might get the pick of the very best and very highest and truest type of American citizenship, skilled in all the problems of traffic, skilled in the problems of legislation—men bright enough and big enough to occupy that position and make that Interstate Commerce Commission rival in dignity the Supreme Court of the United States, and receive a salary as much greater as the powers which you are conferring upon that Commission are greater than the powers and authority of the Supreme Court. And after ten years of service in this body, after an acquaintance with the business world that is somewhat extensive, and having known and respected nearly every man with whom I have ever sat in this House of Representatives, I will say that I believe they are among the highest and truest type of American manhood; that each man is here because, in some degree, he possesses the qualities that have distinguished and made him respected by the people among whom he resides as one of character and capacity. I shall never hear a reproach cast upon the average membership of this House without resenting it.

I know many wise, able, and good men, and I profoundly hope and entertain the opinion that if this measure receives concurrent action at the other side of the Capitol and Executive approval, that there may be selected some man to discharge the duties of the chairmanship of that commission who shall be of such rugged strength, such sterling integrity, and such ability, and such wisdom, such ripened experience, and genuine manhood, as that gentleman whose name the title of this bill bears—the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and ask that he may consume the balance of the day.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], and later in my speech I shall undertake to pay my respects to some of the arguments that he made.

The first consideration of the Republic is the welfare of the people. How to promote general prosperity and prevent the undue concentration of wealth is one of the problems that confronts us to-day. It was the hope of our fathers that in the growth and development of the Republic we would speedily reach that minimum of governmental interference with the efforts and the interests of the citizen which should give him the fullest liberty consistent with security and surrender the whole round of human life as completely as possible to the beneficent action of natural law.

That government is wisest and best which encourages industry and restrains not the proper activities of men. The Government wants every legitimate enterprise in the country to prosper, but it does not want any of them to prosper at the expense and destruction of the others. Since Jacob's cunning obtained the birthright of Esau, it has been necessary to place metes and bounds about human conduct and restraints upon the improper activities of men. [Great applause.] In the struggle for existence, in the race for the comforts and conveniences of life, the citizen is entitled to fair play and a "square deal." When he is diligent in business, enterprising and industrious, and conditions operate to deny him a fair share of material things, they are depriving him of the full and free enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property.

No man is independent of his fellows; his conduct will affect them for good or ill. As long as he recognizes the rights of others, as he should, and remembers his relation to society, and is actuated by a spirit of fairness and justice in all that he does, society has no complaint to make; the Government finds no fault with his conduct. But when he regards the rights of others as useless obstacles in the way of his greed and society as an inviting field for sharp practice, then he becomes an object of regulation for the law. That regulation of economic agencies which encourages industries and enterprises and furnishes ample reward for the proper activities of men are symptoms of genuine progress. [Applause.]

We are not here to legislate in the interest of men who are seeking the advantage of their fellows, but we are here to legislate in the interest of the great mass of the people. It is ours to point out the road of national progress in economic life. We want laws that will increase freedom for the many in all the fields of human endeavor. Those members of society who observe the rules of right must be protected against the lawless and the unscrupulous ones. It is our duty as the representatives of the people to guard the interests of the masses and promote their general welfare.

We should study the condition of our complex economic body as the physician studies the condition of his patient. We must know something of the various branches of political and social science. And we should contribute to that moral force which induces men to acknowledge the truth and do what they know is right, for the whole art of government, said Jefferson, "consists in the art of being honest." [Applause.] Plato and Aristotle did not ask, How can a nation become wealthy? but, "How can the economic institutions and arrangements of a nation be so ordered that the highest welfare of all citizens may be best promoted?" Unless the economic body throughout is in a healthful condition there can be no real prosperity, for prosperity is industrial health. The question is, Shall we correct the evils that exist or allow them to go on until every member of the economic body is injuriously affected or dangerously impaired?

The Interstate Commerce Commission's report shows the criminality of the packers and the railroads, and it denounces their methods as in "open disregard of the law." How can we expect the citizen in the common walks of life to be law-abiding? How can we expect him to respect the law when such flagrant violations by large concerns are noted every day in the public press? If we would have the law respected, the law must be enforced. When a combine, rich and politically powerful, violates the law, the statute is suspended and the court is deaf. We need men who have the courage and the disposition to enforce the law. Edmund Burke has truly said:

> When the people conceive that laws and tribunals and even popular assemblies are perverted from the ends of their institution, they find in these names of degenerated establishments only new motives to discontent.

[Applause.]

It was never intended by the founders that this Government should be converted into a bureau issuing letters of marque under which the kings of ill-gotten gain should prey upon the substance of the people. [Loud applause.] Lawless capital in combinations is making moral cowards of men. They make it so uncomfortable for the young man to thrive outside of their business enterprises that he is driven to the wall or forced to take his place at their bidding in a niche of the great combination. They regard the skill and energy of men as objects of prey for their greed. That condition in our economic body that puts the skill and energy of the many at the mercy of the few is eating on the vitals of this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its annual report for 1904, said:

> We said in our reports to Congress for 1902 and 1903, and now repeat, that in view of the rapid disappearance of railway competition and the maintenance of rates by combinations, attended as they are by substantial advances in the charges of many articles of household necessity, the Commission regards this matter as increasingly grave, and desires to emphasize its conviction that the safeguards required for the protection of the public will not be provided until the regulating statute is thoroughly revised.
> The Commission was established—
> Says Mr. Justice Harlan—
> to protect the public against the improper practices of transportation companies engaged in commerce among the several States.

And Mr. Justice Harlan, in a dissenting opinion, said in substance:

> And now the Commission is a useless body for all practical purposes.

The only right of the Commission is to commence a suit against the railroad to compel it to revise the rate, while the company can continue to charge such rate that it deems best, pending a lengthy litigation.

When Congress is about to convene or a State legislature is soon to assemble these great interests, whose conduct has been discussed and criticised over the country, bestir themselves in various ways to stay the hand of just regulation. Court authorities that were silent all spring, summer, and autumn, while Congress was not in session have, since the Speaker called the Fifty-ninth Congress to order, been making strenuous efforts to indict parties guilty of making secret agreements with railroads constituting a conspiracy. This note of warning, this bold declaration from court officials who have been "winking the off eye," will doubtless send terror into the ranks of the railroads and cause them at least to smile. [Applause.] The inquiry naturally arises, Why were not these investigations made before now? Why all this activity on the part of the courts when the matter of rebates and freight rates is up for consideration by this House? Is not this done to impress us with the idea that the authority for regulating railroads already exists? [Applause.]

In passing the act of 1887, creating the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Supreme Court declared that—

> Administrative control over railroads through boards of commission was no new thing, but that the granting of such power is never to be implied from any doubtful or uncertain language.

That has been the trouble with the laws heretofore. They have been full of loopholes and escape ways placed there for a special purpose, and that purpose was not in the interest of the people. The Supreme Court declared that—

Congress has not conferred upon the Commission the power to prescribe the rates, either maximum, minimum, or absolute.

Then, I ask the question, If you confer upon the Commission the power to declare a rate to be unreasonable, why not confer upon it the power to declare what would be a reasonable rate?

It is not the policy of the Democracy to interfere without just cause with the interest of private concerns. Nor does she desire to fetter commerce by unjust restrictions, and it is not her intention to confiscate the property of the railroads, and the railroads do not believe that such is her desire; but the party does insist upon one just and fair standard of conduct for all public interests. This is Democratic; this is right. Yes, the railroads have rights, but they do not possess all the rights. Their interests should be considered, but theirs are not the only interests to be considered. Until we regulate them in the interest of fairness and justice to all concerned we will not have discharged our duty. Freight rates affect the price of every article that goes into the home of the consumer. The people do not want to cripple or hurt the legitimate interests of the railroads, but the people do want fair treatment at the hands of the railroads. There is no use to be excited because the people are becoming aroused and are manifesting an interest in their own affairs.

Whenever the people get aroused on any line that affects their interests there is a mighty class who employ every agency—the press, as much thereof as can be controlled, and that is no small portion—to quiet the people and to assure them that their grievances are all imaginary—a mere myth. Although surrounded by difficulties and pinched with hardships in the struggle for existence these mighty interests tell them: "You are doing well; let well enough alone." And if a public man is found who comes out on the side of the people and pleads for a betterment of their condition, points out the mighty evils that disturb them, they call him a demagogue. Time was when he who championed a righteous cause was a brave man in the eyes of the American people, and he who never counted the cost or regarded the strength of the opposition and dared to speak the truth was indeed a hero.

Why is it that the name "Jackson" is so loved by the mass of the American people? Because in life he contributed all that it was in his power to contribute to the well-being of the great mass of the people. [Applause.] Jackson was loved by the people because he was their firm and fearless friend. The crafty, avaricious classes despised him because he openly denounced them as enemies to the Government in which they lived. He allowed no barrier to stand between him and the people he loved so well. The purse-proud plutocrats of his day despised him; but, clad in the simple costume of Democracy and armed with a righteous cause, he drove them from the highways of the Republic, exclaiming from the deepest depths of his patriotic soul:

By the eternal gods the people shall rule.

[Loud applause.]

This organized power that we are dealing with to-day is tremendous and must be curbed, for history furnishes no instance where power ever limited itself. Within the limits prescribed by the Constitution it is our duty to do everything possible to prevent this power of railroads and other combinations from absolutely destroying legitimate competition.

I am aware of the fact that those who oppose this measure have all the data that diligence can acquire and all the argument in support of their position that human genius can devise.

The discussion of this question has brought out the fact that the issue is sought by some to be kept between the shipper and the railroad. There are other parties to this issue. The parties who are most affected are the producers and the consumers. The producer who is dependent on a market miles away on the railroad is seriously concerned in the matter of rates. If his competitors can reach the market with their products at a less expense than he can, he is embarrassed and handicapped. The lower the rate the greater the profit to the producer. The consumer, who is largely ignored and cunningly left out of this discussion, feels keenly the evil of unjust freight rates. For after all when the produce is shipped and finally sold to the consumer the original cost, the cost of shipping, and a little profit, of course, all come out of the pocket of the consumer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The shippers are not alone in their demand for just and fair treatment at the hands of the railroads. A vast army of American producers and consumers are making the same demand. [Applause.]

Mr. W. C. Tricket, of Kansas City, Mo., before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, said, among other things:

The complaint on the part of shippers throughout the country is that certain shippers are favored by the railroads directly or indirectly and that rates are not the same for all.

We are told by Judge Fifer who are benefited by rebates and drawbacks—"only a few large shippers."

By the payment of rebates to large shippers it enables them to break down and run out of the business their competitors, thereby lessening the number to whom the original producer can sell goods. So it affects the producer and the consumer also and kills competition, for the more buyers in the market place the better it is for the farmer or for any other man who wants to sell his produce. Judge Fifer says:

You frequently hear large shippers and middlemen remark that they do not care anything about the amount of the rate, provided the traffic will move.

Who, then, is most injuriously affected by the high rates? A vast army of consumers and original producers. Judge Fifer, speaking of railroads, said:

They do not like to come out flat-footed and admit that they charge as much as the traffic will bear, but they do all the same.

Shall they be allowed to make any rate, then, that suits them, although it be unjust and oppressive?

With competition gone and combinations controlling the rate, what will become of the interest of the shippers, consumers, and producers? Judge Fifer says:

When the railroads go to make these rates they do not apply the golden rule, but they apply David Harum's golden rule: "Do the other fellow before he has time to do you."

[Laughter and applause.]

Judge Fifer said:

The rate on cotton cloth from New York to Salt Lake City is $2.30 per hundred. For carrying it 800 miles farther, all the way from New York by Salt Lake City to San Francisco, it is only $1, and that $1 rate affords them a slight profit.

Now, then, he asks:

Is not their profit of $1.30 per hundred in excess for less than nearly a thousand miles excessive?

That, he contends, and rightly so, is the question. Whereupon Senator CULLOM asked him:

Does not that fact almost absolutely make it appear unreasonable to charge $2.30?

Senator CULLOM means, of course, for the short haul.

Yes—

Replied Judge Fifer.

From New Orleans to the Virginia cities, Richmond, Lynchburg, and Norfolk, the distance is 800 miles. Charlotte, N. C., is just half the distance, 400 miles; and yet the rate per ton per mile to Charlotte is four times as much as it is per ton per mile to either one of the other cities—Lynchburg, Richmond, or Norfolk. If they can make a small profit, as they do, on this long haul, is not the charge for the short haul excessive? And is not this treatment of Charlotte outrageous? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The railroad enterprise is hedged about as no other concern is hedged in this coutnry.

A railroad company goes out to build a railroad through a certain section of country. They are armed and equipped by the law with the exclusive right to build a road through that territory, assured from the outset that they will have no competition through that country from any other road. The people, many of them, give the right of way, others contribute timber, and not infrequently they give money. No spot of earth is too sacred for a railroad bed. If your burying ground lies in the track of the survey, it falls a victim to their condemnation proceedings and sells at a price fixed by court authorities. They can take and condemn private property. The Government grants right of way across navigable streams. When the road is complete, the law hedges it by saying, "You shall not deprive it of a fair return on the money invested."

These large concerns laugh at injunctions and civil suits. They need to be prosecuted criminally and made to respect and observe the law. If there is evidence enough to sustain an injunction, the same evidence ought to be sufficient to procure an indictment.

The law is over all, and it must be respected and enforced. The impression prevails—and it is largely true—that the plain people must obey the law and for every violation suffer its pains and penalties; that only those who move in the common walks of life are subject to the law. Every fair-minded man deplores this state of things. Whether he be a private citizen or public official, village merchant or corporation president, he should be made to respect and observe the law.

When these gigantic concerns contribute to the campaign funds of any particular party they expect favors in return from that party when it gets in power. If Members of Congress are beneficiaries of such a fund, how do you expect them to be very strenuous in their efforts to pass laws that would injuriously affect those favorite concerns? I will relate a little story that illustrates the idea that I have. A fellow who was charged with the larceny of a cow was acquitted by the jury, and upon being asked by his attorney how he accounted for the verdict of acquittal when the evidence so clearly established his guilt said:

That is very easily accounted for. Eleven of the twelve jurors got some of the beef.

[Laughter and applause.]

It is the duty of the railroad to furnish all cars, all necessary equipment to carry on all the necessary traffic of the people; and in view of this fact, all shippers should be placed on the same footing, and whether they own cars and other facilities for shipping purposes they should be made to pay the same rate that other shippers pay.

When we urge the necessity of regulating freight rates we are confronted with the statement that the rate is lower here than in any European country. Railroads have already combined in all the European countries, and in this Republic of the West they are combining with unprecedented rapidity, and unless Congress lodges the power somewhere they will, when the combination is all perfected, charge as much, if not more, than they charge in the European countries. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] says, "Give us time. Why this unprecedented haste in the matter of regulating railroads?" Mr. Chairman, for nine long years the transportation companies have been sucking the lifeblood of the producers and the shippers of this country. "Unprecedented haste!" Nine years we have had the Interstate Commerce Commission, with no power to enforce any order; with no law to guide them in regulating freight rates. And yet it is most appropriate that this astounding statement should come from one of those blest in large measure with this world's goods. The gentleman wears the robes of wealth becomingly, and is modest with it all. This is proper. No impulse truly noble ever sprung from pride of purse. [Applause.] He ought certainly to know something of the Democratic feeling on this and other questions that affect the people, as well as the Republican feeling, because the gentleman, if my recollection serves me aright, has been in both parties, and he certainly ought to know what they stand for and how they feel. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Why, the gentleman says, "Whence comes this cry for rate regulation?"

I will ask the gentleman to go and read the printed pages of your Interstate Commerce Commission. Every year they are urging this body, they are clamoring at the door of this House and begging Congress and the President of the United States to give them some power, so that they may answer the demands for rate regulation in this country. Can it be that the gentleman is deaf and does not desire to hear a demand of this character? He speaks of "this unprecedented haste." Millions and millions of dollars, Mr. Chairman, the transportation companies have plucked from the purse of the people during the nine years that the Commission has been without power. [Applause.] Commercial bodies are petitioning this body, the shippers in the gentleman's [Mr. SIBLEY] own State have petitioned this body, have asked it to do something to give them relief.

Not only that, but petitioners in every State in the Union are asking this body to do something. And let me now make a little prophecy to the gentleman. You should have settled this question in the Fifty-eighth Congress. You had the opportunity to settle it, but you would not. It went into the tomb at the other end of the Capitol. They had a committee sitting during the recess. I call it a delay committee. If you will read the testimony taken before that body it will impress you with the idea that the chairman of that committee is hard to enthuse on the matter of regulating railroads. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Before that body, Mr. Chairman, Governor Cummins, from Iowa, testified. In a speech when he returned to his home he said that a mighty and powerful railroad lawyer sat by the chairman and suggested nearly all the questions that were put to him by the chairman, and he said they cross-questioned him as though he was a witness on the stand in court. Investigating in the interest of the people! God save the mark! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But let me finish. That bill died in the Senate. This bill may die in the Senate. If so, I want to tell you that the patience of the American people has about reached its limit.

When the fall elections are over this year, there will be more Democrats occupying your places than there are now, because the Republican party is responsible for the failure to give the people relief, and you can not fool the people by passing it in the House and letting your party kill it at the other end of the Capitol. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The people are aroused on this question, Mr. Chairman. Why, if the gentleman [Mr. SIBLEY] will go out and get in touch with the people he will find what they want. "Unprecedented haste!" This is a remarkable statement for the gentleman to make, with petitions coming here just literally flooding this House, petitions coming from nearly everybody except those that the railroads can control. You will see a convention assemble at their bidding and it will petition you not to do anything to disturb the railroads. That shows you what a tremendous power the railroads have and exercise. I have no prejudice against the railroads. I trust that I am in a position to do what is right, and right is right, as God is God, it matters not who is affected, the private citizen or the greatest corporation in this country.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has truly said this question will not down. I now wish to call attention to what many of the shippers have to say upon this question of railway-rate regulation. No trust or extremely large corporation, but every name is a representative one in the commercial world. These concerns are large shippers of freight. Hence with them the question of fair rates and just practices is not a theory. They furnish the railroad income; they pay the freight.

Arkansas says:

While we are not antagonistic to the railroads, we should have some means of settling just propositions and not be held up as we are upon one pretense and another.

A voice from the Indian Territory says:

These unjust discrimination and abuses in freight rates have bankrupted many good men and prevented the development of many a rich section of the country.

From Kentucky comes the cry for relief from unjust freight rates, unfair practices, and discriminations on the part of common carriers. A voice from Massachusetts wants prompt action and substantial justice when differences arise between the shipper and the railroad. Minnesota expresses the hope that something may be done in the matter of freight transportation. Mississippi, feeling the sting of unjust discrimination and rebates, cries out for equal advantages for freight rates, and hear what Missouri has to say:

The abuse of rates, drawbacks, special privileges, and special concessions to some shippers has grown to such an extent that some remedy should be applied at once in order to bring justice to all alike.

Continuing, it declares:

This problem was never worse than at the present time. In all our experience in the grain business, we have never known the time when the offenses were so flagrant. The people are sorely in need of more prompt adjustment of the transportation difficulties which beset the shippers of this country.

A voice from New York proclaims that—

The small shipper is at the mercy of the railroads. Discriminations are practiced from which appeals to the railroads are in vain. We are losing trade, especially in the South, by the enormous freight rates lately raised. The carriers have had full sway for many years and have proven their profits by their annual reports, which come out of the freight producer. The tariff as it now stands is unjust, and the matter of rate correction and overcharges should be corrected.

North Carolina says:

Something ought to be done to relieve the people from unjust freight rates.

And listen to Ohio:

Traffic abuses must be rectified; shippers everywhere are asking relief at the hands of Congress.

Hear the cry from Pennsylvania:

Present freight rates are out of all proportion, and there should be some interference by the Government.

Tennessee joins in the demand for deliverance from high rates and irregularities in freight matters.

Texas declares that she is in favor of some stringent means of controlling freight rates. The Interstate Commerce Commission, she declares, should not only have the right and authority to make rates, but to enforce them as final.

West Virginia, the home of Senator ELKINS, complains of unjust rates, discriminations in freight rates, and begs Congress to do something to end the evil.

Connecticut says, in the matter of freight regulation, that something should be done, and done without delay.

But—

there will no doubt be an immense amount of opposition against it from the great railroad corporations.

Florida declares that the regulation of freight rates is a piece of much-needed legislation. Hear what Indiana has to say:

She declares absolutely and unqualifiedly in favor of Government control of railroads.

Kansas takes her place alongside her sisters in the demand for fair play and honest freight rates and declares that discrimination, unjust rates, and unfair practices, which now figure so conspicuously in railway transportation, must be removed.

Louisiana lifts her voice in solemn demand for transportation adjustment. Maryland emphasizes the fact that discriminations in the traffic in this country is an enormous amount and should be punished by law.

A voice from Michigan bears testimony to the fact that the people of this country need adequate and prompt relief, for we are now confronted with serious delays between shippers and railways, and urges that the judges or Interstate Commerce Commissioners should not be allowed to accept any favors from the railroads in the shape of passes or other things of value.

Hear what Virginia has to say:

When we come to appreciate that probably 10 per cent of the value of all commodities grown, mined, and manufactured is paid out for transportation we see what an enormous amount of money is paid out in freight, and the people are entitled to some part in establishing and maintaining rates on this immense traffic.

A voice from Wisconsin declares the freight abuses and rates and discriminations given to favored shippers should be remedied, as they operate seriously against the unfavored shipper and are not a fair deal.

Alabama cries out against unjust rates, rebates, and discriminations that bear heavily not only upon the shipper, but upon the small merchant, the large merchant, the producer, and the consumer; for every man who buys farm implements, machinery of any character, or food and raiment pays part of the "rate tax."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] makes an eloquent appeal to do nothing to disturb the railroads. He fears that socialism will seize upon the throat of this Government, and quotes from some little fellow—I hardly know how to class him—prating about a division of property. Why, those things have been written about since the foundation of the world. An idea like that, afloat in the mind of some man out yonder, has nothing to do with this question, and no man in this body will ever believe in such doctrine as that. It is not strong enough to hold up before the mighty march of the representatives of the people in this land at a time like this to deter them from doing what they believe to be right. They are going to see to it that something is done. But I will tell the gentleman how to keep down socialism; I will tell him how to keep down anarchy.

Enforce the law against the mighty rich as well as you enforce it against the uninfluential poor. Lay the hand of criminal prosecution upon the back of Dives in his purple and fine linen as you do upon the Lazarus who wears the tattered garments of poverty and want and you will keep down socialism and anarchy. [Applause.]

I can not think that the gentleman is much alarmed. He talks about wringing every dollar in taxes out of large concerns. Mr. Chairman, it has been my observation (and I have served upon the assessment board as secretary of my State) that the man of comparatively small means bears the burden of taxation everywhere.

One of these gigantic concerns can give in its property at $50,000 that may be worth millions, and the tax assessors know nothing about the value of it. But the man holding property in sight, like land or mules, the assessors can get at the value of them. And so I say that the man of small means, with his goods in sight, the simple things in life, bears the burden of taxation to-day.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the railroads have been "groping" their way under tremendous difficulties. Mr. Chairman, they have the best eyesight for fellows groping in the dark that I ever saw [laughter], for they never fail to put their hands properly on the fellow who has produce to ship, and if you read the figures in the columns at the end of the year in their reports you will agree with an editorial that appeared in a London paper in October, which said that if they were let alone a little while longer they would have all the capital they need now or would need. I agree with that; but while this railroad enrichment is going on what will become of the producer, the shipper, and the consumers all over the country?

We do not want to harm any legitimate enterprise; but we do want, as the President sometimes says, "a square deal." The President is a man with some noble impulses. He gets right occasionally, and he has got a good ear for the ground. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] He can hear the mutterings and rumblings below. He is the best politician in his party. He sees the people marching, and hears the tramp of the multitude in this Government and knows what it means, and he straightway writes a message to this body, and he says: "Regulate the railroads." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] has had the courage to say, "You Democrats are entitled to all the credit for this movement." He is giving us back our own. We are entitled to it, we started it, and we will keep it up. The Republicans advocate things on the stump that they forget when elected to office.

Bees, on flowers alighting, cease their hum,
And Republicans in office soon grow dumb.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said not long ago that the spirit of Bryan permeates the party as no other man has ever permeated it since Jackson's day. Why is this? A young man called upon Senator Hoar and asked what he would advise him to read. Senator Hoar said, "Read the lives of Jackson, Jefferson, and Washington, and men who have stood for something." That is why the spirit of Bryan permeates not only our party but the mass of your party—because he is a man who stands for something. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] says this bill has the indorsement of Bryan and HEARST. I suppose that would go a long way toward making him oppose the measure.

The question was asked the other day in the Senate, "Do you think Bryan will be the next Democratic nominee for President?" We do not know who will be the next nominee, but he will be a man who stands for something and who has talked for something [applause on the Democratic side]; and if Mr. Bryan is the nominee, a man whose every heart throb is loyal to the masses of the people, pampered by no power, and pensioned by no class, if he does come into the White House he will break down the trust idols in the temple of liberty as Daniel of old broke the gilded images of Babylonish idolatry. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, the gentleman [Mr. SIBLEY] says, "You are going into the Government business of regulating things." Does not the Government say to-day to the private citizen and to the banker how much interest his dollar shall earn in a year when he loans it out? Does not your law in every State in the Union limit the earning capacity of the dollar of the bank or of the private citizen when it is loaned? Does not the Government regulate national banks and send your inspector four times a year announced and one time unannounced to investigate and inquire into the funds? Do we not do these things with these interests? If so, are the railroads too sacred to have themselves investigated and regulated in the spirit of fairness and justice?

Mr. JAMES. I might suggest to the gentleman that they let the national banks have the money without interest.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; they use the money of the people without interest, and this is very wrong. A shrewd English engineer once said, and said truly, where combination is possible competition is impossible. Talk about Government ownership of railroads! If it ever comes it will be forced by the Republican party and the railroads—forced by the Republican party because the people will wear out their patience waiting for you to aid in regulating them; forced by the railroads because they defy the authorities of the country and charge any rate that they please. In the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee in the Senate the consumer and the producer were very cunningly left out, and the issue was undertaken there to be confined exclusively to the shipper and the carrier.

Now, this bill provides that the Commission shall declare—and that is a good feature in it, the best feature in it—what is a reasonable rate. Why, it is the sheerest foolishness in the world that a commission should be armed and equipped with the power to declare a rate to be unreasonable, and yet not allowed to say what is a reasonable rate. Another thing, this bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall order monthly reports from railroads, if they see fit to do so.

The gentleman [Mr. SIBLEY] read from an editorial in the Post that Democrats were favoring "centralization of power." Well, that is the newest thing that I have heard, Mr. Chairman. It takes all that the Democrats can do to keep the other side of the House from surrendering all the power to the nation and taking all away from the States. The Democratic party is opposed to giving up the rights of the State. This bill provides that the intrastate rate shall be regulated by the State authorities, and I like the bill because it does recognize that we still have States in the Union. It gives to the people at home the right to regulate their transportation facilities. I will show you where you Republicans violate States rights. You have got it on your statute books now that if a man is killed by a transportation company in his own vicinity, in the county and in the State where he was born, reared, and lived, and his relatives sue in the State court for as much as $2,000, you reach in with the hand of Federal interference and with a motion take it out of that court and put it in a Federal court, where your judges have their pockets full of free passes.

You can sue for nineteen hundred and ninety-nine dollars and ninety-nine cents, and you can keep it in the State court, but the minute you reach $2,000 they reach down and say "That is mine; we will transfer that to a Federal court." Why this injustice, let me ask you? Now, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that this bill ought to provide that no Federal judge should ride on free passes. I do not believe that a man sitting on the bench trying the rights between man and man, with power in his discretion to do this or that favor to this or that party, ought to have himself saved thousands of dollars of railroad expenses by having passes in his pockets. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Put that provision in here and keep your judges from having these passes. What else? I would provide that no judge on this Interstate Commerce Commission should accept a free pass, and I would provide more than that, that they should not have any interest, directly or indirectly, in any railroad stock in the country. I would change the salary; I would put it back like it is now. I would make another change in it. It has some good provisions, and I am going to support it. I would provide that the railroad had to report to this Interstate Commerce Commission every dollar of interest that they own in any property in the Government every year.

It is unfair for them to enjoy the privileges that they enjoy to-day—the right of eminent domain, and all this hedging about by the law—that you and I do not enjoy, that the producer and the shipper do not enjoy; to allow them to come in competition with you through their productive utilities, showing favors to themselves. What is to prevent them from getting their grain into the market first? They own all the transportation facilities. Let the bill provide that they shall give every year a detailed statement of every dollar that they own in any utility in the Government. Let us see how the combinations are worked; let us see how many wheels are working within wheels—make a full investigation of this matter. Another thing. Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he did not think it was right to say what the street cars in the District of Columbia should charge. Of course it is right. I will tell you another provision that your bill ought to contain. Force your street-car companies in this city to furnish separate cars or separate compartments for negroes and whites. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is what you ought to do. Do away with the spectacle of having your white men and negroes riding in the same car; remove forever from the capital of your nation the offensive and distasteful spectacle of seeing negroes crowded into the cars and your ladies standing in the aisle holding onto the straps above their heads. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What will you do about the Pullman cars? Put in a provision requiring them to have separate compartments or separate cars for negroes when they ride over the country in your sleeping cars? Many of you favor that just like I do. [Laughter.] But you have got some constituents of whom you are possibly afraid. The possession of this power, Mr. Chairman, that this bill holds will make the railroads cautious at least. It will be a restraining influence to say what is a reasonable rate. It does not hold, however, a proposition that I would like to see in it, but it is a step in the right direction.

The bill provides that the rate shall go into effect thirty days from the time that it is fixed. It will affect us injuriously, because the cotton crop will be moving in the fall, and they can haul a great deal in thirty days. It is also true with the people in the West, with grain. The rate should go into effect at once. Giving the Commission power to enforce its order is another feature that ought to be in the bill.

When the Commission issues an order to the railroad and the railroad fails to carry out that order, give it the power to bring the railroad official in and punish him for contempt. Give it the power to send the railroad official to the penitentiary. Add an imprisonment clause, and then you will make them respect the law. Make these men respect the law, as you make the humblest citizen respect it.

We are proud, Mr. Chairman, of all the legitimate industries in our country. We want to encourage everything that contributes to the strength and glory of the Republic. Ours is the only nation whose highest judicial authority has declared it to be a Christian nation—the only nation that sets apart a day of thanksgiving to God. "We will not despair of the Republic," employing the phraseology of another, "so long as against the ills of evils we hold the remedy of right." While we are producing material wealth let us pay some attention to the men and the women that we are producing. The nation wants men, "large-hearted, manly men, men who will join her chorus and prolong the psalm of labor and the psalm of love." Let us return to that old-time simplicity of the fathers—

When all were for the state,
When the rich man helped the poor man,
And the poor man loved the great.

God hasten the day when East and West and North and South shall all work for the good of each and each for the good of all. Rich in the heritage of history, proud of our splendid present, resplendent in the glow of conscious strength, we are happy in the rosy promise of a glorious future. When the Democrats get back in power and regulate these economic institutions and arrangements in the interest of the great mass of the people and strike off the hand that holds up the producer and the hand that robs the consumer we will exclaim: "Land of our fathers, through thy length and breadth a tremor passes. Look! The dark is done, and on thy proud form shines the splendor of the sun. Thine own children with heads erect and light on all their faces are happy in the triumph of Democracy's creed!" [Loud applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the measure which we are now considering is the most important matter that has presented itself to this Congress. In my judgment it is one of the most important measures that any Congress has been called upon to consider during the past quarter of a century. It brings us face to face with the question whether or not our National Government should assume any degree of control over any industrial organization; and if so, under what conditions. Whether or not we may enact a rate bill is essentially, then, only a part; however, a highly important part of a still greater question.

The province of government does not find limitation in our day in the mere protection of individuals against wrongs or threatened wrongs of those who are physically of greater strength. That was largely the province of the headsman of the tribe among those peoples who were our ancestors. It was the duty of the people to support him in that power. That system of government may have been the most perfect in its time. It may have met all purposes required at a time when the needs of a people's life were limited to daily wants, when foods were plucked from bending branches or felled by bow and arrow in the forest, when clothing was in large part the skins of animals, and every man was the rude builder of his home, his own clothier, his own farmer, his own laborer in the supplying of every want. Since that time innumerable steps and dire hardships, the throes of noble and lofty ambitions, have marked the progress of our race, and when our fathers wrote the Constitution for the government of our land they declared, as though by divine inspiration, the province of government not bounded by anything short of that which would bring the greatest well-being to the masses of our people.

Conditions change and legislation must keep pace with the needs of every hour, else government fails in that which it is its duty to perform. If in the industrial world an element that at one time insured fair dealing and equality has by means of new conditions become eliminated, and if by the elimination of that element, injustice will be done our people, it is the province of government to supply, if possible, by proper legislation that which will mean the perpetuation of the good and the eradication of the wrong.

COMPETITION AND ITS ELIMINATION.

Competition, in some form or other, has until recent years acted as the great equalizer in the industrial world. Maybe it was the competition between business men that insured fair prices. Maybe it was the competition of a different commodity which would serve the purpose just as well as the commodity which was originally sought. Maybe it was the competition of the old garments, the old implements, the old house, that would be still further used unless the new garments, the new implements, the new house, could be supplied at a reasonable and fair price. Competition it was, at any rate, that until the last few years acted as the great natural regulator in the marts of commerce.

But the world has moved on rapidly. Our ideals and our wants have changed. The luxuries of yesterday are the necessities of to-day. Yesterday you wore the garment from the loom that ran by hand. To-day the factories of the world supply your needs better. Yesterday you used the sickle and the flail in garnering your grain. To-day with the rhythm of the click click of a combined harvester, the clean kernels drop from waving heads and are ready to be shipped to market. Our fathers waited many months to hear the news of events that happened on the frontier of our own land. To-day the morning papers tell of the happenings last night in the streets of Russia's capital. All this progress has come not alone by labor, not alone by the expense of energy and thought, but by the mighty cooperation and organization of wealth. And the organization of wealth it is that is destroying competition. I am not here to say that something better than competition may not be devised. I am not here to say that the combination of wealth is wrong, for the wants of an enlightened age call into use every faculty of man and every means whereby the greatest economy can be exercised in the supplying of those wants. I am here to say that the organization of wealth is wrong unless the best fruits of such organization go, not to a favored few, but to the people of our nation. They are the producers of the wealth of the world, and to them should accrue the benefits.

REGULATION MUST TAKE THE PLACE OF COMPETITION.

If competition, then, is being eliminated, it becomes the duty of our Government to supply a means to take the place of competition if it appears that the general well-being of our people so demands. Capital, at all times, has been a hard master. "Get returns" is the command that it has given to those whom it employs. And in "getting returns" the masses of our people are compelled to contribute unreasonably to capital or else go without that which the ideals of the times demand that they should have. If this, then, is true, the people themselves must do one of two things—they must either assume the ownership of noncompeting industries that have to do with the prime wants of life, or else they must control by legislation the industries referred to, that have grown so great that no competitors appear to contest the way. From the present view point Government ownership seems unwise. I am strongly convinced, however, of the wisdom of Federal or State control of these great business concerns as the condition of the industries might require, to the end that the wrongs of unbridled avarice may be abolished and organized wealth take its place beside genius and energy in supplying the world's great needs.

DEVELOPMENT OF RAILWAY INDUSTRY.

The development of the railroad industry in the United States has been phenomenal. Five times a Presidential election occurred prior to the application of steam to the navigation of boats upon our waterways. Eleven elections of President had passed by before the first railroad had been built. Since then scarcely more than three-quarters of a century have passed away, and yet our railway systems are essential to our nation's welfare. They have become the highways of commerce, the great thoroughfares of trade. The canvas-covered wagon belongs to history, and the stagecoach is making its last run. Our railroads are extending their ramifications throughout all sections. They bind the East to the West, the North to the South. They make us all neighbors. You step upon the cars at Golden Gate and in a few hours more than half a week have crossed a continent and look out upon the waters lighted by the Statue of Liberty. The annual receipts for the business that they do approximate $2,000,000,000. Add to the value of all our imports the value of all our exports for a single year and the figure scarcely exceeds this sum. Our railroads extend 200,000 miles, and would eight times encircle the globe. The value of our lines is more than $13,000,000,000, and our railway systems employ an army of almost 1,300,000 men. They have done more than any other industrial force for the enlightening of our people and the harmonious development of our land. Not only this, but the railroads of the United States in equipment and in management are the wonder and the admiration of the world.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT AND GENERAL WELFARE.

We are proud of this and we have a right to be. Ours is a record unequaled by any other nation, and it reflects upon the intelligence of our people. But this is not all. We have reached the point in our development when it is time to pause. Our growth has been tremendous. By means of railroads untold wealth has been added to our nation. Now is the time for us to remember that a nation's greatness does not depend upon material wealth, nor yet upon the rapidity of industrial unfolding. Much does depend upon the equality of opportunity, equality of possibility, the general prosperity and happiness, not of the man whom wealth has favored, but of the many who toil along life's way. Unless the masses of our people are prosperous our nation can not achieve that for which it was established. That system is wrong that tends to the aggrandizement of wealth in the hands of a few and the consequent impoverishment of the many, and that system has no place in modern government.

> Ill fares the land, to hast'ning ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
> Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made:
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroy'd can never be supplied.

It has been said that this deliberation means the calling of a halt to future railroad building. My answer is that if we are building right it does not mean the calling of a halt. If we are building wrong, we had better stop. Better a thousand times we prune the limbs of our industrial tree than that the strength of all go out to one rank bough and spoil the symmetry of perfect growth.

ORGANIZATION IN RAILROAD INDUSTRY.

There was a time when competition was the controlling factor in the regulation of railway rates in freight and passenger traffic. There was a time when many lines under different management covered almost all the railway mileage that is covered to-day, and necessarily in the interest of self-protection made such rates as approximated expenses incident to transportation and fair interest on the capital invested. That time has passed. The era of combination has come, and to-day not more than six or eight gigantic combinations control the policies of transportation over nearly all our miles of railway. The result is that competition has been eliminated, and in its stead has been adopted the rule of charging all that the traffic will bear. The Interstate Commerce Commission, speaking upon this question, said in its annual report for 1904:

> In view of the rapid disappearance of railway competition and the maintenance of rates by combinations, attended as they are by substantial advances in the charges on many articles of household necessity, the Commission regards this matter as increasingly grave, and desires to emphasize its conviction that the safeguards required for the protection of the public will not be provided until the regulating statute is thoroughly revised.

WEAKNESS IN FORMER RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

This new condition has not come upon us in a day nor in a year. It has been the result of railroad development for many years. Almost twenty years ago Congress passed a law establishing the Interstate Commerce Commission and conferring upon it certain powers. This same law sought to place such limitations and restrictions upon our railroads as would meet the evils that were then apparent. This was legislation in a new field. The trail was not well blazed. The industrial world was experiencing a remarkable revolution. The railway itself had grown so far beyond the bounds of early days that it was no longer a mere highway, as a canal, upon which the world of shippers was free to haul its goods, but it had become the agent of the shipper as well as the highway. Ten years passed by in which the provisions of this law, rudimentary as it was, were carried out with reasonable success. In 1897 the Supreme Court of the United States cut out the heart of what had been supposed to be the law by deciding in the Maximum Rate case that the Commission did not have the power to fix a reasonable rate after it had found a rate fixed by the railroads was unreasonable.

But, sirs, this is not all. The fixing of unreasonable rates on certain articles of transportation became only one of many evils that found birth in the combination of wealth. Railroads not only fixed excessive rates upon particular articles and thereby reaped wealth at the expense of the consumer, but they recognized favored shippers, and granted them better rates than other shippers who deserved as fair consideration. Not only this, but they placed prohibitive rates upon goods of other shippers, because, perchance, a favored shipper or the railroad itself owned a commodity that it wished to sell, or, as in the case of the shippers of railroad ties referred to a little while ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], because the railroad wanted to purchase the commodity at some time for its own use and at its own price. Sections of country and cities have likewise been discriminated against.

The Elkins Act was passed three years ago and has afforded some relief. It is aimed mainly at the system of rebates and discriminations and is not sufficient there. The provisions of the law have been skillfully avoided, and clever devices have been resorted to to thwart the working of the law and the law which it amends. We could mention the "midnight schedule," where a favored shipper would be notified in advance of a certain rate on a certain day. The favored shipper would take advantage of the schedule, and before other shippers could do likewise the old rate would be established. We could mention icing and terminal charges, unreasonable charges for private cars, unreasonable division of the freight charges with a favored shipper who might own a mile or two of track, unreasonable elevator charges, and a host of other devices for increasing rates to one shipper while making the favored shipper in his line supreme.

There is probably no one who will deny that the control of oil by one gigantic combination of wealth has been brought about by means of a system of rebates that has crushed out competition in the interest of one concern. No one will deny that the amalgamation of the railroads in the anthracite coal regions has worked havoc with the independent coal operator and placed the consumer at the mercy of one large monopoly. The cattle and sheep growers of my own State and of the West are putting outrageous assessments into the pockets of the stock combine, and you of the East are charged prices that are extortionate for the very meats upon your table. But more than this, the constant tendency, under existing law, does not augur more favorably for the consumer. The tendency is the other way. The tendency is toward the absolute control and domination of the food supplies, of the commodities essential to our daily well-being, by combinations that have no sympathy, that feel the pangs of no conscience, that know only gain.

MEETING THE PRESENT SITUATION.

How shall we meet this condition? That is the question of the hour. President Roosevelt, who is leading the thought of our nation in one of the greatest formative periods of history, has taken no uncertain stand. He deals at length with the question in his annual message to this Congress. I quote only in part:

In order to insure a healthy social and industrial life, every big corporation should be held responsible by and be accountable to some sovereign strong enough to control its conduct. I am in no sense hostile to corporations. This is an age of combination, and any effort to prevent all combination will be not only useless, but in the end vicious, because of the contempt for law which the failure to enforce law inevitably produces. We should, moreover, recognize in cordial and ample fashion the immense good effected by corporate agencies in a country such as ours, and the wealth of intellect, energy, and fidelity devoted to their service, and therefore normally to the service of the public, by their officers and directors. The corporation has come to stay, just as the trade union has come to stay. Each can do and has done great good. Each should be favored so long as it does good. But each should be sharply checked where it acts against law and justice.

The immediate and most pressing need, so far as legislation is concerned, is the enactment into law of some scheme to secure to the agents of the Government such supervision and regulation of the rates charged by the railroads of the country engaged in interstate traffic as shall summarily and effectively prevent the imposition of unjust or unreasonable rates. It must include putting a complete stop to rebates in every shape and form. This power to regulate rates, like all similar powers over the business world, should be exercised with moderation, caution, and self-restraint; but it should exist, so that it can be effectively exercised when the need arises.

The first consideration to be kept in mind is that the power should be affirmative and should be given to some administrative body created by the Congress. If given to the present Interstate Commerce Commission or to a reorganized Interstate Commerce Commission, such Commission should be made unequivocally administrative. I do not believe in the Government interfering with private business more than is necessary. I do not believe in the Government undertaking any work which can with propriety be left in private hands. But neither do I believe in the Government flinching from overseeing any work when it becomes evident that abuses are sure to obtain therein unless there is governmental supervision. It is not my province to indicate the exact terms of the law which should be enacted; but I call the attention of the Congress to certain existing conditions with which it is desirable to deal.

In my judgment the most important provision which such law should contain is that conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a given rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and if it is found to be unreasonable and unjust, then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the maximum reasonable rate, as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts. It sometimes happens at present, not that a rate is too high, but that a favored shipper is given too low a rate. In such case the Commission would have the right to fix this already established minimum rate as the maximum; and it would need only one or two such decisions by the Commission to cure railroad companies of the practice of giving improper minimum rates. I call your attention to the fact that my proposal is not to give the Commission power to initiate or originate rates generally, but to regulate a rate already fixed or originated by the roads, upon complaint and after investigation. A heavy penalty should be exacted from any corporation which fails to respect an order of the Commission. I regard this power to establish a maximum rate as being essential to any scheme of real reform in the matter of railway regulation. The first necessity is to secure it; and unless it is granted to the Commission there is little use in touching the subject at all.

Illegal transactions often occur under the forms of law. It has often occurred that a shipper has been told by a traffic officer to buy a large quantity of some commodity and then after it has been bought an open reduction is made in the rate, to take effect immediately, the arrangement resulting to the profit of the one shipper and the one railroad and to the damage of all their competitors; for it must not be forgotten that the big shippers are at least as much to blame as any railroad in the matter of rebates. The law should make it clear, so that nobody can fail to understand, that any kind of commission paid on freight shipments, whether in this form or in the form of fictitious damages, or of a concession, a free pass, reduced passenger rate, or payment of brokerage, is illegal. It is worth while considering whether it would not be wise to confer on the Government the right of civil action against the beneficiary of a rebate for at least twice the value of the rebate. This would help stop what is really blackmail. Elevator allowances should be stopped, for they have now grown to such an extent that they are demoralizing and are used as rebates.

All private car lines, industrial roads, refrigerator charges, and the like should be expressly put under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission or some similar body so far as rates, and agreements practically affecting rates, are concerned. The private car owners and the owners of industrial railroads are entitled to a fair and reasonable compensation on their investment, but neither private cars nor industrial railroads nor spur tracks should be utilized as devices for securing preferential rates. A rebate in icing charges, or in mileage, or in a division of the rate for refrigerating charges is just as pernicious as a rebate in any other way. No lower rate should apply on goods imported than actually obtains on domestic goods from the American seaboard to destination except in cases where water competition is the controlling influence. There should be publicity of the accounts of common carriers; no common carrier engaged in interstate business should keep any books or memoranda other than those reported pursuant to law or regulation, and these books or memoranda should be open to the inspection of the Government. Only in this way can violations or evasions of the law be surely detected.

A system of examination of railroad accounts should be provided similar to that now conducted into the national banks by the bank examiners; a few first-class railroad accountants, if they had proper direction and proper authority to inspect books and papers, could accomplish much in preventing willful violations of the law. It would not be necessary for them to examine into the accounts of any railroad unless for good reasons they were directed to do so by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is greatly to be desired that some way might be found by which an agreement as to transportation within a State intended to operate as a fraud upon the Federal interstate-commerce laws could be brought under the jurisdiction of the Federal authorities. At present it occurs that large shipments of interstate traffic are controlled by concessions on purely State business, which of course amounts to an evasion of the law. The Commission should have power to enforce fair treatment by the great trunk lines of lateral and branch lines.

The question of transportation lies at the root of all industrial success, and the revolution in transportation which has taken place during the last half century has been the most important factor in the growth of the new industrial conditions. Most emphatically we do not wish to see the man of great talents refused the reward for his talents. Still less do we wish to see him penalized; but we do desire to see the system of railroad transportation so handled that the strong man shall be given no advantage over the weak man. We wish to insure as fair treatment for the small town as for the big city, for the small shipper as for the big shipper. In the old days the highway of commerce, whether by water or by a road on land, was open to all; it belonged to the public and the traffic along it was free. At present the railway is this highway, and we must do our best to see that it is kept open to all on equal terms. Unlike the old highway it is a very difficult and complex thing to manage, and it is far better that it should be managed by private individuals than by the Government. But it can only be so managed on condition that justice is done the public. It is because, in my judgment, public ownership of railroads is highly undesirable and would probably in this country entail far-reaching disaster, that I wish to see such supervision and regulation of them in the interest of the public as will make it evident that there is no need for public ownership.

The opponents of Government regulation dwell upon the difficulties to be encountered and the intricate and involved nature of the problem. Their contention is true. It is a complicated and delicate problem, and all kinds of difficulties are sure to arise in connection with any plan of solution, while no plan will bring all the benefits hoped for by its more optimistic adherents. Moreover, under any healthy plan, the benefits will develop gradually and not rapidly. Finally, we must clearly understand that the public servants who are to do this peculiarly responsible and delicate work must themselves be of the highest type both as regards integrity and efficiency. They must be well paid, for otherwise able men can not in the long run be secured; and they must possess a lofty probity which will revolt as quickly at the thought of pandering to any gust of popular prejudice against rich men as at the thought of anything even remotely resembling subserviency to rich men. But while I fully admit the difficulties in the way, I do not for a moment admit that these difficulties warrant us in stopping in our effort to secure a wise and just system. They should have no other effect than to spur us on to the exercise of the resolution, the even-handed justice, and the fertility of resource, which we like to think of as typically American, and which will in the end achieve good results in this as in other fields of activity. The task is a great one and underlies the task of dealing with the whole industrial problem. But the fact that it is a great problem does not warrant us in shrinking from the attempt to solve it. At present we face such utter lack of supervision, such freedom from the restraints of law, that excellent men have often been literally forced into doing what they deplored because otherwise they were left at the mercy of unscrupulous competitors. To rail at and assail the men who have done as they best could under such conditions accomplishes little. What we need to do is to develop an orderly system; and such a system can only come through the gradually increased exercise of the right of efficient Government control.

That is a strong message, and it voices the wisdom of our people. The committee, who have worked so earnestly and well in the preparation of the bill we are now considering, have followed as their guide the words of President Roosevelt. Let us notice, then, the provisions of this measure.

PROVISIONS OF THE PENDING BILL.

First. The bill, by definition, gives broader meaning to the word "railroad" than does the present law, and declares that word to include all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind, also all freight depots, yards, and grounds used or necessary in the transportation or delivery of persons or property. It gives broader meaning to the term "transportation," and makes that term include cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration or icing, storage, and handling of property transported. It is made the duty of every carrier subject to the provisions of the act to provide and furnish such transportation upon reasonable request therefor, and to establish through routes and just and reasonable rates applicable thereto.

Second. It is provided that every common carrier subject to the provisions of the act shall print and keep open to public inspection schedules showing the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers and property which any such common carrier has established and which are in force at the time upon its route. The schedules printed shall plainly state the places between which property and passengers will be carried, and shall contain the classification of freight in force, and shall also state separately the terminal charges, icing charges, and all other charges which the Commission may require, and any rules or regulations which in any wise change, affect, or determine any part of the aggregate of such rates, fares, and charges. Copies of the schedules shall be placed with the Commission as soon as the schedules may be determined. They may not be changed except after thirty days' public notice, unless by consent of the Commission for good cause shown, and every change in schedule shall be promptly filed with the Commission.

Third. The bill provides that all charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property shall be just and reasonable, and that every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof shall be unlawful. The Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized and empowered, and it is made its duty whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint, it has found that the provisions of the law for fixing rates have been violated, or that such rates are unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial, to determine and fix a just and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed, and such rate shall be the maximum rate that may be charged. The order for this rate shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. The Commission may also, under this bill, after hearing on a complaint, establish through routes and joint rates, and may also, in event of the failure of the joint carriers to come to an agreement, apportion the rate that each carrier shall receive. It is also provided that should the owner of property transported under this act render any service connected with transportation or furnish any instrumentality used therein, the charge and allowance therefor shall be no more than is just and reasonable, and the Commission may, after hearing on a complaint, determine what is a reasonable maximum charge to be paid by the carrier or carriers for the service so rendered or for the use of the instrumentality so furnished and fix the same by appropriate order.

Fourth. Should any carrier, officer, representative, or agent of a carrier, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, or agent of either of them, knowingly fail or neglect to obey any order made under the provisions of the law referred to before, he shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $5,000 for each offense. Every distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense. It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of the forfeitures, and the Commission may, with the consent of the Attorney-General, employ special counsel in any proceeding under this act, paying the expenses of such employment out of its own appropriation.

Fifth. It is further provided that if any carrier fails or neglects to obey any order of the Commission, other than for the payment of money, while the same is in effect, any party injured thereby, or the Commission in its own name, may apply to the circuit court in the district in which such carrier has its principal operating office, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order shall happen, for an enforcement of such order. From any action upon such petition an appeal shall lie by either party to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in such court the case shall have priority in hearing and determination over all other causes except criminal causes, but such appeal shall not vacate or suspend the order appealed from.

Sixth. After a decision, order, or requirement has been made by the Commission in any proceeding, any party thereto may at any time make application for rehearing of the same or any matter determined therein, and it shall be lawful for the Commission, in its discretion, to grant such a rehearing if sufficient reason therefor be made to appear. After such rehearing and the consideration of all the facts, including those arising since the former hearing, if it shall appear that the original decision, order, or requirement is in any respect unjust or unwarranted, the Commission may reverse, change, or modify the same accordingly. Whenever an order of the Commission made in pursuance of the law, other than an order for the payment of money, shall have been complied with for three years, such order shall not thereafter be in force as against the carrier so complying therewith.

Seventh. The Commission is authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of the law and from the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce, to prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the Commission may need information. Such annual reports shall show in detail the amount of annual stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipments; the number of employees and the salaries paid to each class; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the accidents to passengers, employees, and other persons, and the causes thereof; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balance of profit and loss, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet and other information that the Commission may require. The Commission may prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by the carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and all such records shall be open for inspection at all times to the members of the Commission. Suitable penalties are provided for failure to comply with the provisions of the act.

Eighth. It is provided that the Commission shall be increased from five to seven members, that the salary of each Commissioner shall be $10,000 per year, and that each member shall be appointed for a term of seven years. Not more than four members of the Commission shall be appointed from the same political party.

DISCUSSION OF SOME OF THE PROVISIONS.

This, Mr. Chairman, covers the general scope of the pending bill, and, in my judgment, this measure strikes at the heart of existing evils. The sections of the bill giving broader meaning to the terms "railroad" and "transportation," so that they shall include, as I have pointed out, terminal facilities, and the necessary means of accommodation in transit will very largely do away with the possibility of secret rebates of all kinds. And, after all, this is the most pernicious evil that confronts us, as we take up the shipping question. Freight rates and passenger rates may be too high. Whole sections of country may suffer, and the people of communities may be compelled to deny themselves the pleasures that they desire, or indeed the comforts that they should have, but so long as the burden rests upon the shoulders of all alike, the people will support the burden with great degree of patience.

This evil, great as it may be, does not compare with the evil of granting such concession to privileged concerns, as will enable them to flourish and grow strong on the loss of their competitors, and in the end maybe bring ruin to their doors. What would we think of a system of government that would permit the tax collector to return to favored persons the taxes, or one-half the taxes, that they had paid? This question is propounded to me in a letter which I have received to-day from one of my constituents, and my correspondent, who is a thoughtful man, asks, then, if the rebate system is not as pernicious as the system he proposes would be, and if, indeed, the case that he suggests is not parallel to the giving of rebates to favored shippers. I believe that he is right, and I hope that the first day this bill becomes a law, for I believe it will become a law, will bring the day when that enormous wrong shall be crushed out forever.

MAY DETERMINE THE MAXIMUM RATE.

The Commission, should this measure pass, will have the power not only to determine what is an unreasonable or unjust rate, but also the power to say what rate shall stand as the maximum rate that may be charged. This provision will help individuals, and it will help communities. It will tend to equalize charges. Let me give an illustration. If the rates that are being charged for hauling freight from eastern points to Seattle and Portland and other points in the Northwest, three or four hundred miles beyond Spokane, Washington, Lewiston, or Boise, Idaho, or Pendleton, Oreg., are just and fair, manifestly the rates that Spokane and Lewiston and Boise and Pendleton pay are unreasonably high. A railroad can not long conduct its business when it is losing money. If the railroads are losing money on the greater run, then one thing is plain, the people who support the cities of Spokane and Lewiston and Boise—all the people of the great inland empire, as we call that section—are paying the freight for the people who live still farther west. If the railroads are not losing money in handling the traffic of the longer run—and I do not believe they are—then the people of my own State are being done a greater wrong, for the money that they contribute is being paid not to aid others of our citizens who are building up neighboring commonwealths, but to increase the wealth of companies that are already making fair returns on their capital invested. It will not do to say that the coast cities, having water competition, are therefore entitled to this unfair advantage. The fact is, the rates of the inland country are unreasonably high. I could cite still other illustrations where industries and sections of other States are being discriminated against in behalf of other favored industries and favored sections. I hope that this wrong will be avoided by the passage of this bill.

The other provisions of the bill tend in the main to the carrying out of the provisions to which I have referred. The publicity required in the making of schedules and in the keeping open of the books of the railroads will undoubtedly prove a powerful aid in the enforcement of the law. The penalties that have been prescribed are severe, and that which is as essential as penalties in case of violations of the law is speediness with which trials may be had. The feature of the bill which clears the way for consideration of cases and their determination by the Supreme Court of the United States prior to any other matters except criminal cases is one of the strongest elements of the bill.

NEED OF SPEEDINESS IN LITIGATION.

There is one other thing in this connection that I am not certain should have been provided. President Roosevelt, in his annual message from which I have already quoted, says further:

> I urge upon the Congress the need of providing for expeditious action by the Interstate Commerce Commission in all these matters, whether in regulating rates for transportation or for storing or for handling property or commodities in transit. The history of the cases litigated under the present commerce act shows that its efficacy has been to a great degree destroyed by the weapon of delay, almost the most formidable weapon in the hands of those whose purpose it is to violate the law.

We have already taken one step looking to the prevention of this delay, but I believe the bill would be a stronger bill if there had been provided a separate court to hear appeals from the Commission and from which appeals would lie direct to the Supreme Court. The greatest weakness in the American judicial system to-day is the tardiness with which justice is meted out. This is true in part because the calendars of our courts are overcrowded and our jurists overworked. By requiring the circuit courts of the United States to hear appeals from the Interstate Commerce Commission you require each circuit judge to preside in a class of cases where erudition in the law counts for much, but where technical learning in the thousand intricate questions pertaining to railway transportation counts for more. A separate court would develop a class of judges that would aid the people of the country by the promptness with which the provisions of the law would be defined and applications made. Why, the transportation industry is an enormous business. Five and three-quarter millions of dollars represent the gross receipts of the railroads of the United States for every day throughout the year for freight and passengers handled—$240,000 every hour. You can hardly follow the enormity of figures. The cost of maintaining such a court would be infinitesimally small compared with the values that might be involved, while the good the court would do would, in my judgment, be incalculably great. The enforcement of a bad law caused the shippers of cattle and sheep in Idaho a loss of $150,000 in 1905.

The prompt decision of a single case affecting the shipment of cattle or sheep or grain from a section of country limited to my State alone might mean the saving in a single year to the people of that section an amount equal to many times the cost of maintaining the court which I suggest. I mention this to call attention to the importance of prompt decisions where the rights of individuals and communities are at stake and when great interests are involved that affect the humblest as well as the most powerful citizen within our land. This idea is not a new one. Provision for such a court was made in the original bill—last session—of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. HEPBURN], but the majority of that committee have decided not to include provision for such a court in the measure which they have reported. Time alone will tell us which idea should prevail. This we know: The members of that committee have been actuated by patriotic zeal and lofty courage in bringing forth a bill which they believe will assure that measure of relief for which the people of our country are crying out to-day.

There are a few other modifications that I would make, but probably there is no Member of this body who would not change a line here and add a word there, if it were in his power so to do. Aye, the measure does not represent the exact thought of any member of the committee that prepared the bill. It is a compromise, but in the main it does represent my wish, and in the main it represents what I believe to be the wish of the Members of this body.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF PENDING BILL.

There are some who tell us that this measure if enacted into law will fall before the Constitution. Against that statement there is little that I care to say. First of all, the constitutionality of the question can not be determined by any branch of our Government other than our judiciary. In the next place, if legislation similar to this is not in accordance with our Constitution, we want to know wherein it fails, and we want the question to be determined within the earliest possible time. If our Government is so limited under the Constitution that it can not control monopolistic wealth, then must our Constitution itself be modified that the rights of our people may be preserved. I believe, however, that the provisions of this bill will come within the scope of our Constitution. I believe from what examination I have been able to give this phase of the question that the Supreme Court has spoken in many cases upon the propositions here involved. Following out this idea, I want to call your attention to the letter of May 5, 1905, of Hon. William H. Moody, one of the ablest Attorney-Generals our country has ever had, and the present occupant of that high office. The letter is addressed to Hon. STEPHEN B. ELKINS, chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, United States Senate, in response to the request of the committee for the opinion of the Attorney-General upon this question. Mr. Moody cites a long series of cases that are most interesting, and at considerable length he expresses his own views upon the constitutionality of this question, and, in my judgment, his opinion warrants us in attempting the legislation which is here proposed. At the conclusion of the letter the opinions of Mr. Moody are summed up as follows:

> 1. There is a governmental power to fix the maximum future charges of carriers by railroads vested in the legislatures of the States with regard to transportation exclusively within the States, and vested in Congress with regard to all other transportation.
> 2. Although legislative power, properly speaking, can not be delegated, the lawmaking body, having enacted into law the standard of charges which shall control, may intrust to an administrative body not exercising in the true sense judicial power the duty to fix rates in conformity with that standard.
> 3. The rate-making power is not a judicial function and can not be conferred constitutionally upon the courts of the United States, either by way of original or appellate jurisdiction.
> 4. The courts, however, have the power to investigate any rate or rates fixed by legislative authority and to determine whether they are such as would be confiscatory of the property of the carrier, and if they are judicially found to be confiscatory in their effect to restrain their enforcement.
> 5. Any law which attempts to deprive the courts of this power is unconstitutional.
> 6. Any regulation of land transportation, however exercised, would seem to be so indirect in its effect upon the ports that it could not constitute a preference between the ports of different States within the meaning of Article I, section 9, paragraph 6, of the Constitution.
> 7. Reasonable, just, and impartial rates determined by legislative authority are not within the prohibition of Article I, section 9, paragraph 6, of the Constitution, even though they result in a varying charge per ton per mile to and from the ports of the different States.

Here I shall end my inquiry prior to the vote that I shall record. It is sufficient to warrant that vote, and it is sufficient to support the belief I have that this measure will be upheld by our courts, deciding as they must, under the Constitution of the United States, the instrument that marks the bounds of all our legislative acts.

A WORD IN CONCLUSION.

Another word and I have done. We have witnessed, Mr. Chairman, the tremendous development of this great country of ours. We have seen our nation take front rank among the nations of the world, and we are proud of our success. No nation was ever great whose people were not bound together by splendid public highways. The mighty product of American genius, which more than any other industrial factor has contributed to the building of our cities, the expanding of our industries, the populating and developing of our several Commonwealths, is the American railroad. A rude beginning only eighty years ago, the American railway soon found itself essential to our progress. Cities vied with each other in donations to railroad building. Counties bonded themselves for sums greater than they could bear. States gave liberal encouragement, and some of them to their financial loss. The National Government itself, realizing the importance of thoroughfares of commerce, appropriated 190,000,000 acres of virgin land that railroads might assume the responsibility of extending their lines with the progress of the pioneer, and it has been written down as one of the great events of the first century of our nation, the driving of the last spike in the first railway across the American continent. That was only a little while ago; but with the tremendous power of American genius, the railway systems have been extended, and they have contributed their full share to the building of our greatness.

The railroads are to-day quasi public institutions. Within and dependent upon our Government, they are yet essential to its well-being. Their capital is tremendous and their income every year is more than three times as great as the income of the United States. But this is not the only way that they are powerful. You have no farm so beautiful but that the railway may extend its lines across your fertile fields. You have no home so humble or so great but that the railroad may lay its tracks beside your door. Aye, the cemetery in yonder vale is not immune, but through its plats the railroad plows its way, if perchance that course would serve its purpose best. You can not say it nay. Theirs is the power of eminent domain, and that power is coextensive with the public welfare. More than this, by means of organization they have for the most part eliminated competition, and to-day our 80,000,000 people are dependent upon the wishes of a few men who control the railway systems, save only as inadequate laws furnish scant protection.

Individual States have done something, and yet if all the States controlled the commerce within their bounds the Federal Government would still be left its task to do, for twenty times the commerce within the States the States can not control. It is interstate commerce and can be reached alone by the laws of our National Government. If, then, competition in any industry has been well-nigh eliminated by means of the amalgamation of wealth, if an industry has grown so great that it has become in part a public institution, if the franchises granted it waive the rights of the individual that the general public may thereby be better served, then it becomes our right, aye, more than our right—it becomes our duty to make such laws as will give to the people generally the protection that they deserve. Organization of wealth is right when the best fruits of such organization go, not to a favored few, but to the masses of our people—the bulwark of our nation's strength. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VREELAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad rate bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 538. An act for the relief of Mr. Charles T. Rader—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

S. 3318. An act to allow the entry and clearance of vessels at San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, and Monterey, Cal.—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Senate concurrent resolution 4:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into the advisability of establishing a harbor of refuge by the construction of a breakwater on the island of Nantucket, Massachusetts, at or near the westerly side of Great Point, for the purpose of providing better protection for commerce and the lessening of the perils of navigation to coastwise traffic in the adjacent waters—

To the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 5023. An act granting an increase of pension to August Westfield.

STATEMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] asks unanimous consent for present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to furnish for the use of the House the following information:

1. Statement of appropriations for permanent specific and indefinite objects, giving titles and dates of facts of appropriations and reference to statutes.

2. Statement of appropriations for permanent specific and indefinite objects proposed to be repealed by House bill 8991, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, and the expenditures therefrom during the fiscal years 1904 and 1905.

3. Statement of appropriations for permanent specific and indefinite objects not repealed by House bill 8991, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, and the expenditures therefrom during the fiscal years 1904 and 1905.

4. Whether in his opinion said House bill 8991 should be enacted with or without amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House, in accordance with the previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, at 11 o'clock a. m.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CARMACK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1378) to amend the act to regulate commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FARM BULLETINS.

Mr. MONEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the farm bulletins as published by the Department of Agriculture, from No. 1 to the last number, inclusive, already published, or that hereafter may be published, be bound in volumes of suitable size, so that a set of such volumes shall comprise a copy of all of the bulletins issued by the Department of Agriculture, and that 15,000 sets be printed and bound, of which 2,700 sets shall be for the use of the Senate, and 7,500 sets for the use of the House of Representatives, and 9,800 sets for the use of the Secretary of Agriculture for distribution to public and school libraries.

SENATE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BAILEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary be, and he is hereby, instructed to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable day—

(1) The name of each Senate employee.

(2) The salary of each Senate employee.

(3) The duties of each Senate employee, and where those duties are performed.

(4) The name and salary of each employee assigned to the several committees of the Senate.

STREET-RAILROAD FRANCHISES.

Mr. GALLINGER. Senate Document No. 9, being a letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting a report in respect to franchises granted to street railroads in the principal cities of the United States, is out of print, and there is great call for it. I ask unanimous consent that a reprint of that document may be ordered.

The being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 250 copies of Senate Document No. 9, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, "Letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting a report in respect to franchises granted to street railway companies in principal cities of the United States," be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

MODELS OF NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, two days ago I entered a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the bill (S. 90) providing for the deposit of a model of any vessel of war of the United States Navy bearing the name of a State of the United States in the capitol building of said State was ordered to a third reading and passed.

I wish to withdraw the motion I then entered and allow the bill to go to the other House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks leave to withdraw the motion he entered for the reconsideration of the votes by which Senate bill No. 90 was passed. Without objection, the motion is withdrawn, and the bill stands passed.

THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. NELSON. The bill (S. 26) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service was reported by me yesterday from the Committee on Commerce. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 83. Joint resolution for a report, etc., upon the preservation of Niagara Falls, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

THE STATEHOOD BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

The bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. KEAN. It might be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. It might be read. I have no objection.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to know if the bill has been reached on the Calendar in regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been reached in regular order.

Mr. TELLER. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator does not object to the reading?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator has no objection to its being read?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes; I do not want to hear it this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Pension Calendar will follow. I understand the next cases on the Calendar are pension bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They are.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before going into that matter, I desire to speak for not to exceed three minutes on the question of the pure-food bill upon a remark that was made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] yesterday, as published in the Post this morning. I looked in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and I could not find any statement of his remarks at the time of the introduction of the amendment, which is nothing more than the pure-food bill, so called, that has been prepared by what is termed the "National Association of Manufacturers."

In the statement of the Senator from Mississippi, as it is given in the Post, is the following:

"I do not believe in giving the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture the power to hold up the foods of the country and to arbitrarily say that they shall be branded as poisonous and adulterated, without any appeal to the courts for redress," said Senator MONEY yesterday.

This statement, Mr. President, has been made so often and has been denied so often by those who are interested in the passage of some pure-food measure that it seems somewhat improper to make a denial of the suggestion again. But I want to say once for all that there is nothing in the bill which is before Congress at the present time to justify the suggestion. There is nothing whatever in the bill to justify it now, nor has there been anything in the bill to justify it for the last four years.

It is not proposed that the Secretary of Agriculture shall in any way, shape, or manner determine what the standard of foods shall be. He is not to pass in any way upon the question whether any food or drug or condiment of any character shall enter into interstate commerce. He simply assists by examining such articles as he believes may fall within the prohibition of the pure-food law, if it becomes a law, and submits his statement to the district attorney. Even before submitting any question to the district attorney he gives notice to the manufacturer or the person interested in the sale of any product, and that person or manufacturer can appear before the Secretary of Agriculture and have a hearing upon the matter. If it shall develop that there is no cause for submitting the matter to the district attorney, then, of course, it will not be so submitted.

The objection that I understand is made, however, by the Senator from Mississippi is to a provision that is inserted in what is known as the "Heyburn bill." The bill which I introduced at the last session, and which received the favorable report of the Committee on Manufactures, simply provided:

If it shall appear from such examination that any of the provisions of this act have been violated, the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice to be given to the parties concerned, with opportunity to be heard, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and if after such hearing it is found that any of the provisions of this act have been violated, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall at once certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analyses or examinations, duly authenticated by the analysist or officer making such examination under oath.

This is the provision that I think ought to become a law. The Senator who introduced the pending bill, which is for the main part a copy of that reported last year, however, does insert another clause. He is not present to-day—I understand that he is sick—and I simply call attention to the addition which he has placed in the bill following the provision for examinations:

And public notice of the facts shall be given by publication in such manner as the rules and regulations may prescribe to all other persons, association of persons, or corporations in whose possession like articles may be found or known to be that such article is within the provision of this act.

I am not prepared, Mr. President, to explain the reason for inserting this clause. I presume the object, however, to be to give notice to all persons in some public way that if it be found by the Secretary of Agriculture that any food product is prohibited under the provisions of this law, they may immediately cease from dealing in such product. I can say for my own part that I do not consider that provision as material or even as necessary.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say just one word with reference to the amendment submitted yesterday. I know the sincerity of the motive of the Senator who introduced the amendment, which, as I have suggested, is the bill of the Association of Manufacturers of the United States. The purpose of that association, I think, was properly stated in the National Druggist when the association was organized. Without going into the details of it, the article is headed "How to kill pure-food legislation, or how to prevent pure-food legislation," and then it goes on to state the object of the organization of this society, which is to do battle against any food legislation at this session of Congress. I have read over very casually the bill which has been prepared by the association. If it is intended to stop the traffic in adulterated or misbranded foods, it will be just as successful in stopping it as a sieve would be in stopping the flow of water—nothing more, nothing less.

I do not desire to call attention to the defects in that measure at this time. I shall do so later on. I can only say now that it is intended not only to keep our present condition as it is in reference to the introduction of fraudulent goods into the several States, but also to curtail the power of the officers of the States to protect a State against the influx of these spurious articles. That can be demonstrated, I think, by a reading of the bill itself.

This is all I desire to say at this time, Mr. President, upon the measure; and I should like to take up the Calendar of unobjected pension bills until 2 o'clock. I think, however, we can get through with them by 1.

IMPROVEMENT OF TENNESSEE AND CUMBERLAND RIVERS.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senate for just a few minutes.

At the last session of Congress the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and I were, by resolution of the Senate, constituted a committee charged with the duty of investigating the navigation of the Tennessee River. That duty we have attempted to perform in a report embodying the results of our investigation. The practical wisdom and learning of the Senator from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, has illuminated this subject, and that of itself is sufficient assurance that the report we have presented is worthy of the attention of this body.

It is to be regretted that Congress is just now so much concerned with matters relating to Santo Domingo, the Philippines, Morocco, and other distant parts of the universe that there is little hope that matters pertaining to that part of the world in which we live will be deemed worthy of more than passing notice. At some time when the nation shall have gathered together its scattered faculties and recalled its wandering thoughts from missions of bootless knight-errantry in other lands, when the erring and extravagant American spirit shall have hied to its confine, Congress may give some thought to questions which relate simply and solely to the welfare and prosperity of the people of the United States. Perhaps the shrewd practical sense of the nation will then begin to count the cost and to calculate what might have been if all the wasted energy and squandered wealth had been devoted to other objects than the chasing of phantoms.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has well said that we are still legislating in the shadow of war. Out of a mere passion for purposeless activity or a mere vanity to show ourselves among the great powers of the world, we are entangling our country with European nations in the affairs of Morocco, where we have no interest and with respect to questions in which we are not the least concerned. We are expected to vote without question hundreds of millions for a mighty navy, though we know that fully half this money is for empty pomp and vanity, for mere strut and swagger; but a river and harbor bill, which means millions of dollars of added wealth to the country, must stand like a beggar at the door of Congress with its hat in its hand. I hope the time will come when the commercial interests of the country will fully awake to the importance of liberal appropriations for our waterways. When they do they will see the necessity of enforcing economy in other lines of expenditure. Under the system that now prevails there is a sort of cutthroat war among the various interests seeking appropriations to get a share of the money doled out by Congress, whereas they should be standing together in a common effort to get enough for all. Important improvements already in progress in my State are threatened with suspension because of this supposed necessity to save enough on economical appropriations to supply the demands of waste and extravagance. I have repeatedly said that there is no money spent by the Government in which there is so little waste as in that appropriated for our rivers and harbors.

There is no expenditure that yields so large a return in increased wealth and prosperity. A battle ship may be a necessary burden, but it is purely a burden. Every dollar expended for such purpose is wasted from an economic point of view. It is necessary from a military standpoint, but it takes that much from the productive wealth of the land. But an expenditure which increases wealth is simply a profitable investment. So long as a nation grows richer by what it spends it can spend freely. A tax which enriches the taxpayer is not a tax, but a bounty. The people will not complain of expenditures which will vastly increase their prosperity.

An incident in the improvement of the country's waterways, but one of inestimable value, is the automatic regulation of railway freight charges that results therefrom. Wherever there is water competition there is no complaint of unfair or excessive charges in railway transportation. The struggle that has been going on for years to find some way effectively to regulate railway freight charges shows the importance of this consideration, and if we can extend the remedy by providing the effective competition of water carriage it will take an immense burden from the industry and commerce of the country.

An apt illustration of the beneficent effects of water competition has been called to my attention by my colleague in the House [Mr. GAINES of Tennessee]. This was a case where a shipper of tobacco made complaint that he was charged 25 cents a hundred pounds for shipment from Franklin, Ky., to Louisville, a distance of 134 miles, while the charge was only 12 cents a hundred from Nashville to Louisville, a distance of 184 miles, over the same road. Yet this seemingly unjust discrimination was justified by the fact of water competition on the Cumberland River from Nashville, and this, too, despite the fact that the rate from Franklin to Louisville was itself held down to a certain extent by reason of water competition. As there are over 57,000,000 pounds of export tobacco grown in the area drained by the Cumberland River in Kentucky and Tennessee, the enormous gain to the producers of this article alone is suggestive of the vast importance of water competition.

The committee has considered the Tennessee and the Cumberland, for reasons set forth in the report, as one system of navigable waters. These rivers rise in the same mountain range and in close proximity; their upper tributaries flow from the same coal and iron fields and through the same vast forests. Both are necessary to the development of the vast mineral and other resources of that region, and both should have the most liberal aid from the Government. I shall not attempt to review this report at length, but will submit certain extracts therefrom:

"In their westward course they diverge, the general course of the Cumberland being to the south of west, while the course of the Tennessee is nearly south, through East Tennessee, until it breaks through Waldens Ridge, at Chattanooga, a distance of 188 miles from Knoxville. Then it flows west for a distance of 230 miles, through Alabama to Riverton, where it enters a great valley known as west Tennessee, and runs nearly due north and parallel to the Mississippi for a distance of 226 miles to its junction with the Ohio. The Cumberland River enters the same great valley near Nashville, and traverses it on a course near to and parallel with the Tennessee for a distance of about 75 miles, and enters the Ohio, at a point about 12 miles above the mouth of the Tennessee, at Paducah. In the circuit of their courses these rivers inclose the richest areas of east Tennessee, middle Tennessee, and north Alabama to the east, and of Mississippi on the west, in two great parallelograms, which they nearly inclose on four sides. One of these great unbroken areas covers the entire watersheds of the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers east of Paducah. The other is inclosed on three sides by the Tennessee, the Ohio, and the Mississippi rivers.

"It is difficult to give to either of these rivers—the Cumberland and the Tennessee—full justice in respect of the care due to them from the Government, without recognizing and respecting the fact that their resources of wealth and commerce, like their geography and geology, are almost identical. Taken together, these rivers and their watersheds present a feature that is so anomalous and so grand as to deserve special consideration.

"There is no part of the world that has greater or more varied wealth of industial resources than the great parallelograms included in the watersheds of these rivers of Tennessee, Alabama, and Kentucky. It includes the great mineral and agricultural region, with its splendid forests, between the watershed of the Ohio on the north, and of the Alabama, Savannah, and Chattahoochee on the south.

"It is a country that stands apart from other regions as possessing within its own limits all the staple material that is necessary to the highest development in agriculture, forestry, minerals, water power, and steam power. Tennessee River, in connection with the Cumberland, is longer than the Ohio from their respective heads of navigation to Paducah, where they unite, and serves a purpose of commercial advantage that no other river in the United States affords.

"This is a just treatment of the subject, for reasons already stated, and for the more important reason that the division line between the watersheds of Cumberland and Tennessee rivers from their headwaters in the same mountains to Mississippi River is marked by a range of low hills, across which railroad lines are constructed at a low cost and will be very numerous as competitors for the transportation that will be demanded by this vast region, filled with stores of native wealth.

"In the improvement of all our interior rivers their power to control the cost of transportation is the factor of paramount importance, and Ohio River, owing to the configuration of its watershed, does not afford so controlling an influence over the cost of railroad transportation as Cumberland and Tennessee rivers.

"The Ohio watershed is long and narrow and, taking Paducah or Cairo as the point of destination for the heavy products of the commerce floated on Ohio River, the distance to the mines and forests and to the richer fields of agriculture tributary to the Ohio is much greater than it is to those that supply commerce to the Cumberland and the Tennessee.

"Cumberland River, rising in the western slope of the Allegheny Mountains, has an almost direct course to the Mississippi, while the Tennessee has its principal source in the eastern slope of those mountains, and its headwaters are assembled in the prolongation of the great valley of Virginia.

"The mouth of Tennessee River, at Paducah, is farther to the north than Knoxville, its present head of navigation; so that its general course in two of its longest reaches parallels the Mississippi, and in its western reach it runs in the opposite direction. In its general course it runs from the south to north, while the Mississippi runs from north to south.

"This gives to all the region in the watershed of the Ohio a line of navigation into the South that is east of the Mississippi and is independent of it.

"As this line of navigation reaches to North Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, and passes nearly across east Tennessee and quite across west Tennessee and into Kentucky, its importance to the commerce of the country along the Ohio can scarcely be exaggerated.

"Tennessee River is so located geographically as to gather the transportation of commerce from the valley of Virginia, from western North Carolina and northern Georgia, from eastern Tennessee and northern Alabama, from northern Mississippi and west Tennessee, and bear it northward into Kentucky. No other river in the United States has a course along which such vast and inexhaustible resources of industrial and commercial wealth are stored, or that can bear them northward to the great bays that reach from Paducah to Illinois River.

"TENNESSEE RIVER AND ITS AFFLUENTS.

"For the purposes of this report this river will be considered as being navigable from Knoxville to Paducah, those being the points between which the Government has projected and, in some degree, has accomplished plans of improvement. The length of this part of the river is 653 miles. The altitude above sea level at Knoxville of the river surface at low water is 792 feet and at Paducah it is 278 feet. This gives to the river an average fall of seventy-nine one-hundredths of a foot per mile.

"BANKS OF THE TENNESSEE.

"The course of the river in its entire length is through a soil that is chiefly clay, and there is no considerable part of its banks that are subject to erosion, even in the most excessive floods.

"With reference to obstructions caused by the washing of its banks, or the deposit of silt, sand, or gravel, it may be said that in an engineering sense, and as to deposits from erosion, caving, or floods, that neither Tennessee River nor any of its affluents have caused or are likely to create any ground of apprehension as to its future serious obstruction at any point.

"It is only at Knoxville and Chattanooga that Tennessee River has for its banks the base of any high elevations that might be designated as mountains, and these are for short distances.

"It is probably true that no river in the United States is more convenient of access to the people with wagons and teams or better suited for the use of the water power it affords along its banks and in localities that are healthful and attractive for homesteads. The water power of Tennessee River and its affluents is a very important part of its advantages, especially in many and varied manufacturing industries and in the future increase of the commerce of the river, which will be specially considered in a separate part of this report.

"GEOGRAPHY OF THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

"In the brief discussion of the watersheds of Cumberland and Tennessee rivers and their practical identity in commercial productions and in their transportation lines some allusion has been made to the remarkable geography of Tennessee River.

"This feature of the subject is a matter of such an extraordinary value to the United States that the committee should not fail to present, at least in outline, its elements of the wealth and the opportunity it furnishes to such numbers of our people to send them afloat upon its waters as active commerce. The first course of Tennessee River is to the south-southwest from Knoxville to Chattanooga, a distance of 188 miles.

"The principal affluents of the Tennessee in this section are the Holston, which has its principal sources in the mountains that flank the great valley of Virginia on either side as far north as the watershed of the rivers of West Virginia, and the French Broad, the Clinch, the Little Tennessee, and the Hiwassee.

"HOLSTON RIVER AND THE RAILROADS.

"The improvement of the navigation of the Holston is left out of this discussion for the future separate examination that it will bring out as a competitor with railroads in the valley of Virginia.

"If Tennessee River had even a 6-foot channel from Knoxville to Chattanooga those railroads could make better profit in hauling the heavier productions of the Holston Valley to Knoxville, the nearest point of water navigation, than they could possibly realize by hauling them to New Orleans, or Memphis, or St. Louis, or Pittsburg, or Cincinnati, or Chicago, the reason being that such productions, even those as light as corn, wheat, potatoes, hay, etc., will not bear the railroad freight rates for such long distances in competition with more favored fields of production, while coal, iron, stone, timber, and the ores of copper, zinc, lead, and many other valuable productions are driven from the markets at home and abroad by the cost of railroad transportation.

"What is true of the valley of the Holston is true of the valleys of the French Broad and of the Clinch, the Hiwassee, the Little Tennessee, and of every river between Knoxville and Chattanooga that flows into the Tennessee.

"When an estimate based on known facts and conditions is made as to the values that are now paralyzed or rendered useless for the want of river transportation on Tennessee and Cumberland rivers, our country will suffer a reproach that is little short of the willful destruction of its richest and most enduring treasures of wealth, by its neglect to improve their navigation.

"GEOGRAPHICAL DIVISIONS OF TENNESSEE RIVER.

"The proper divisions are the eastern, extending from the mountain sources to Chattanooga; the central, from Chattanooga to Florence, Ala.; and the western, extending northward from that point through a part of Alabama and Mississippi and through west Tennessee and southwest Kentucky to join the Ohio River at Paducah.

"The ultimate destination of the commerce collected along these three divisions of Tennessee River, each running in a different direction, is generally assumed as being the Gulf of Mexico, through the lower Mississippi. But a far more important point in its concentration and distribution, as it concerns the welfare of the people of the United States, is at the bays and estuaries in the center of the watershed of the Mississippi River that reaches around from Paducah to Illinois River.

"The three great and distinct areas that supply this commerce, each making a contribution to its volume that is drawn from the country through which each division of the river flows, is within itself equal to that of other water courses of several times its length in other regions within the watershed of Mississippi River.

"In respect of the concentration of the commerce produced in each of its geographical divisions and drawn from the country through which it flows, Tennessee River has no rival within the watershed of the Mississippi.

"EASTERN DIVISION.

"The eastern division has its origin in the Blue Ridge range of mountains and the eastern slope of the Alleghenies, in water courses that meet in the great valley of Virginia. This valley extends through East Tennessee, northwestern Alabama as far south as Coosa County, and northern Georgia, where it ends by contact with a different geological system—the metamorphic or granitic system—which extends into the Carolinas. It also meets the coal measures that extend, on the western side of the Coosa River (which is within the watershed of the Alabama River), in a northeasterly direction across Tennessee River at Chattanooga, and across the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, Virginia, and Maryland, into Pennsylvania.

"Some force of nature from the direction of the Blue Ridge or Smoky Mountain range, pressing toward the great depression of the Mississippi River, seems to have caused Tennessee River to break through the cordon of these coal measures at Chattanooga, thus changing its course suddenly to the west.

"This abrupt change of direction of Tennessee River left a long reach of the valley of Virginia, between Hiawasse River and the watersheds of the Alabama, the Chattahoochee, and the Savannah rivers, nearly as far to the south as Atlanta, Ga., without water transportation to the Gulf of Mexico.

"A very large and rich area of country, extending eastward to the Smoky Mountains, or Blue Ridge, and southward to the watershed of these rivers, was made tributary, as to water transportation, to Tennessee River on its westward course and practically concentrated at Chattanooga, so that, in considering the rights of the people and the duty of the Government in giving preference to navigable water courses over all other systems of transportation, in the necessary anticipation of the coming time when the water courses will be the primary system of transportation, to which all others will be subsidiary, this rich area of the valley of Virginia and its flanking mountains, stored with coal and iron, will find enormous advantage in concentrating its heavy commercial material for transportation on Tennessee River at and above Chattanooga.

"CENTRAL DIVISION.

"From Chattanooga, where Tennessee River breaks through Waldens Ridge, which is an extension of the Allegheny Mountains, to Alabama, Tennessee River curves to the south, in a course nearly parallel with the extension of Waldens Ridge, westward, which is there known as the Sand Mountain Ridge. All of this range of mountains is superimposed upon coal measures that demark its boundaries.

"This great curve of Tennessee River reaches as far to the south as Guntersville, Ala., which is 105 miles from Chattanooga, measured by the river channel, and is 36 miles south of Chattanooga. Thence it flows through Alabama, on a course that is nearly west, to Florence, and thence to the northeastern boundary of the State of Mississippi.

"On the northern side of the central division the Tennessee River receives, through Sequatchee Valley chiefly, the coal, iron, and timber that comes from the western slope of the Alleghenies and the spur ridges into which it is divided as far north as the Cumberland watershed.

"This and other valleys leading to Tennessee River and extending to southeastern Kentucky are capable of supplying incalculable quantites of coal, iron, and timber for transportation in that river, which is the only water route accessible to them, at a cost that will justify their development.

"In the southern counties of Tennessee there are extensive deposits of phosphates and of iron ores that are of great value.

"On the southern side of this central division the coal measures that form the northern watershed of the Alabama River are within a distance of from 5 to 50 miles of Tennessee River in its entire extent through Alabama and a part of northwestern Georgia.

"Within a distance of 50 miles from the river the vast beds of coal and iron along the northern slope of Sand Mountain, with an elevation of about 700 feet, are easily accessible to its transportation. If this was the only route of transportation for coal and iron from the Sand Mountain coal and iron deposits, known as the 'Birmingham district,' to the Gulf of Mexico, that district would still be more important to the world than the coal mines of Wales and the iron mines of Sweden.

"The transportation of the coal and iron products that are in easy reach of Tennessee River to the Gulf of Mexico and along the shortest lines to the western watershed of the Mississippi would make the eastern and central sections of Tennessee River the most important body of water in the world as to commerce in coal and iron.

"If there was no other commerce on these two sections of Tennessee River besides coal and iron and their products, the United States would have a greater material interest in the improvement of their navigation than they had in the connection of the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans by the grants, subsidies, loans, and privileges accorded to the Union and Central Pacific railroads.

"The benefits of this transportation on Tennessee River are greater in money value, more permanent and more useful to the people of the United States, and more indispensable to their progress in all industries and in all the necessities of national strength than this great transcontinental line.

"When the other elements of commercial wealth are taken into consideration, the eastern and central divisions of Tennessee River far excel the Union and Central Pacific railroads as contributors to the wealth, power, convenience, and permanent growth of the United States.

"WESTERN DIVISION.

"Beginning at Florence and passing through the northeastern corner of the State of Mississippi, Tennessee River turns abruptly to the north, in its flow to join the Ohio at Paducah, a distance of 226 miles. It again passes across the State of Tennessee, and penetrates Kentucky far to the north, nearly on a line east and west with the head of navigation of the Kanawha River in West Virginia. It reaches a line, northward, that is the real southern base line of the navigation of the Ohio River. It thus forms three sides of a grand quadrangle of which the Ohio and the Kanawha form the fourth, which wants only about 125 miles of being closed in a complete circuit of navigable waters.

"It may be safely left to American enterprise and the presence of commercial necessity, to square this great circle, by a system of canalization that will connect the Kanawha, through the valley of Virginia, with the Holston or with Clinch River. When that is accomplished, we can compare notes with the French, the Belgians, the Hollanders, and the Germans, as to works of useful internal improvement, without suffering national reproach.

"But the present importance of the western section of the Tennessee River does not depend upon any further development of national advantages or necessities. They crowd upon us now with a present pressure of necessity, and the inducement of profit to the people, that is irresistible.

"A marvelous and inscrutable force of nature diverted the waters of the Tennessee after they had broken through the coal measures at Chattanooga on a headlong course to the basin of the Mississippi, squarely to the north to join the Ohio. The Tennessee, thus running in a course directly opposite to that of the Mississippi for a distance of 226 miles, is east of the Mississippi at an average distance of 75 miles. For 50 miles Cumberland River runs north alongside the Tennessee at an average distance of 10 miles.

"The waters of the Tennessee at Riverton travel 226 miles to reach the same latitude as that of the Mississippi at Cairo, while a barrier of only 75 miles on an average separates them. These conditions need not now be discussed, except in the view that they force the vast commerce of the Tennessee and the Cumberland on a shorter water line to Pittsburg and to Chicago by the distance of 266 miles and away from New Orleans by a distance of about 500 miles.

"Florence is about 500 miles nearer to Pittsburg and Chicago by water routes than it is to New Orleans.

"These conditions are now in sharp discussion between competing railroad companies. They show the great interest the Ohio River and the Lakes have in the improvement of the navigation of Tennessee River.

"The western division of Tennessee River has a commerce that grows upon its banks which would make it one of the most important water courses in the United States. It has no mines or minerals of extraordinary importance, but its forests of timber, its vast productions of cereals, grapes, and fruits, added to its exceptional importance in the production of cotton, make it a great center where all mineral wealth of the central and eastern divisions and all of the wealth of the three great divisions in grain, forage, timber, animal and dairy products, cotton, wool, and of the arts and manufactures that enter into commerce, domestic or foreign, will be collected for distribution or will pass through to the markets of the world.

"Along this western division is the northernmost reach of our cotton fields, which, in their most fruitful yield, extend over all the country of the great cotton belt that begins at the James River, Virginia, and reaches to the western borders of Texas and Oklahoma.

"All three of the divisions of Tennessee River are included in this cotton belt, from Knoxville to Paducah, and furnish this indispensable textile to all the eastern watershed of the Mississippi at the cheapest cost for transportation.

"It does not seem possible that Congress can be indifferent to the improvement of the navigation of this river that belongs to the people, because the wealth of their lands still enables them to bear the heavy burden of taxation in the form of railroad freights which they must pay to their owners. There is no just reason why this burden should not be reduced.

"The Ohio and Tennessee rivers west of the Alleghenies, with the shorter rivers that rise in those mountains or their foothills and flow between them to meet the Mississippi, encompass the largest, the most productive, and the most salubrious and beautiful upland region of country in the world.

"None of these rivers are competitors with each other for the transportation of commerce or with any other system of navigable waters. Each of them is of material assistance to all the rest in distributing the wealth of every form of commerce, and no improvement of the navigation of either of them can be made that is not a benefit to all the rest. The man who works in Montana is as sensibly, if not as directly, benefited by the improvement of the navigation of the Tennessee or the Ohio River as the man who works in Knoxville, Pittsburg, or Monongahela."

I omit from this statement that part of the report which sets out at length the character and importance of each of the tributaries of the Tennessee of which I have spoken, though it is worthy the careful reading of every man who feels an interest in the subject. I ask attention, however, to the general summary which the committee has made:

"THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THESE FIVE GREAT REPOSITORIES OF WEALTH THAT AWAIT DEVELOPMENT THROUGH SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY ALONG THE COURSES AND WITHIN THE WATERSHEDS OF THE HIWASSEE, THE LITTLE TENNESSEE, THE FRENCH BROAD, THE HOLSTON, AND THE CLINCH RIVERS.

"The overruling Providence that controls the destiny of the United States and of all nations and peoples seems to have held these great resources of civilization in reserve to supply the wants of other localities as they are disclosed by the rapid growth of the facilities of transportation that draw together the distant parts of the world into closer social, industrial, and commercial relations.

"The rapid increase of transportation routes and facilities that are established, and the still greater development now in process of construction, have created new necessities for the vitalizing food and sustenance of commerce that now points the way to the southern reaches of the Blue Ridge and the Alleghenies and their valleys and rivers with the unerring hand of destiny.

"These mountains and valleys and their water courses show a combination of the powers of nature in support of the highest civilization that is nowhere equaled in solid value and is not excelled in the variety of its resources.

"In the brief notes above copied from the careful surveys made by our engineers, which are greatly amplified in their full reports, that are of the highest authority, we find vast areas of the most productive soils, yielding enormous crops of food, cereals, and textiles, fruits and grapes, and forests that are almost primeval and include all the varieties of trees that grow in the Temperate zones, and vast beds of coal and of iron, zinc, lead, and copper ores, and rich veins of gold, and great quarries of marble that excel those of Italy in texture and in the varieties of beautiful coloring, and all the slates and rocks that are useful and beautiful in architecture, and the hills crowned with the plumes of stately pine forests that never fade or fall, and the hills and valleys decorated with fields of cotton that, like bridal wreaths, welcome the coming of the snows and the hoar frosts of northern winters.

"The beauty of this mountain region and its salubrious climate and springs of pure water can not fail to attract the many millions of people who are searching the world over for pleasant homes.

"In the industrial outlook there is a factor of supreme value which is above price. It is the water power that is afforded by the thousands of slight obstructions formed by ledges of rock that cross these streams and their affluents.

"The aggregate of these water powers and the details as to their respective values will not be known for a great number of years, but the present value of those that are most conspicuous and inviting for the development of power for driving machinery is many times greater than the value of all the coal that underlies eastern Kentucky, eastern Tennessee, and western North Carolina for such uses.

"This added capacity for generating power to drive local machinery sets free a vast amount of coal for export that would otherwise be consumed at or near the coal mines. This is an unfailing element of wealth that is nowhere found in such supply or so intimately associated with all the productive industries as it is within the watershed of Tennessee River and its affluents.

"This great field for the production of power by the use of water or steam-generating fuel is also the native ground of splendid forests, fertile fields of agriculture, vast mineral deposits, and veins of ores. The material for manufactures and the power to convert them into articles of indispensable necessity and into the finest fabrics of handicraft are in the most intimate association within the watershed of Tennessee River, and they are all awaiting the helping hand of Congress to afford them a living chance in the competitive markets of the world.

"NAVIGATION OF TENNESSEE RIVER.

"The sources of the Tennessee and Ohio rivers are in the great Appalachian Range of mountains. They flow to the Mississippi through a region of upland separated by low intervening elevations that scarcely demark their respective watersheds after they leave the mountain range. Their minerals are the same; their forests are practically the same; their fruits, grasses, and grains are the same; their textiles are the same, except as to the cotton growth, and they unite at Paducah, within 42 miles of the Mississippi River. Their identity, in a commercial sense and as to the character of the population that inhabits their watersheds, is complete throughout the great region that includes the Illinois, the Ohio, the Cumberland, and the Tennessee rivers. Whatever Congress does for the improvement of one of these rivers is for the benefit of all.

"Taking the Ohio and Tennessee rivers as the leading channels of commerce in this great area, and considering the identity of the purposes they serve and of the benefits they confer, it is clearly just and right that the improvements to be made in their navigation should be regulated by a common standard, as far as practicable, and should be in accordance with one continuous system, to be established by Congress and steadfastly adhered to.

"It is the absence of such systematic work and expenditures that has heretofore created jealousies between those especially interested in certain sections of the two great rivers.

"A more unnecessary, unprofitable, or destructive rivalry and bickering could scarcely be found in any country. A proper system of improvements for both these great rivers, in which all are practically agreed, and is firmly established, is at the foundation of true, steadfast, speedy, and economical work in this great public duty.

"These are twin rivers in all material respects and require systematic uniformity of treatment by Congress. Their respective affluents should be cared for, as to the times and the amounts of appropriations and as to other regulations, in accordance with their contributions of commerce to the main channels and the necessities of the people who are to use them as the country is more fully developed.

"MAXIMUM AND MINIMUM DEPTHS OF THE MAIN CHANNELS.

"Pittsburg and Paducah for Ohio River and Knoxville and Paducah for the Tennessee are the established points between which Congress should now prescribe the laws to regulate their future navigation on a common basis, as to the maximum and minimum depths of their channels at all places where their present depth does not exceed the maximum so established.

"The maximum depth of channel at such places should be fixed as a permanent basis, or foundation plan, that will stand as a basis for present legislation and future operations, so far as can now be determined, and is therefore the major proposition in the great problem to be solved.

"CONGRESS HAS ESTABLISHED A MAXIMUM DEPTH.

"Congress, for reasons that probably have reference to the necessities of a particular section or the advantage of manufacturers and shippers at Pittsburg, has established a 9-foot channel as the depth of the main affluent of Ohio River, and has appropriated the money to provide such a depth of channel by means of locks and dams.

"It can not be imputed to Congress that it found special reasons for establishing this depth of channel above Pittsburg, and that the entire length of Ohio River below Pittsburg should be excluded from such advantages, either by reason of natural obstructions in that river or for economic reasons.

"It must be assumed, the contrary not appearing, that Congress thus established a 9-foot channel as the proper basis of improvement of the navigation for Ohio River in its entire extent, to be provided in accordance with a wise and just financial economy from time to time as the improvements progress.

"The present low-water depth on the obstructions of Mississippi River indicate that vessels of even 13 feet draft coming out of Ohio River can pass to New Orleans at all seasons without obstruction or that such a depth of channel can be easily provided.

"This fact establishes the proposition that Congress has acted wisely in providing a 9-foot channel as the present minimum depth of Ohio River, to be worked out in future to a depth of, say, 12 feet. The wisdom of this action of Congress is supported by every fact that relates to the local and national value of this great water course for commercial purposes and is sustained by the right of the people to have their navigable water courses improved for their common benefit, so that boats which can navigate the shallowest parts of the Mississippi as far north as Cairo shall be able to navigate the Ohio to Pittsburg and the Tennessee to Knoxville.

"It is unnecessary to attempt to state all the facts that sustain this action of Congress, nor is it possible at this time, for they will multiply and increase in number and importance as time advances.

"This decree of Congress, that Ohio River is to have a 9-foot channel at all places of obstruction, will never be reversed.

"MAXIMUM DEPTH IS THE BASIS OF ALL IMPROVEMENTS.

"The most important inquiry with which this committee is charged is to ascertain whether a 12-foot channel between Knoxville and Paducah is practicable, at a reasonable cost.

"We have already stated some of the broad foundations of justice and of public necessity and economy on which the claim for a 9-foot channel in favor of Tennessee River is based, and will proceed to further establish it now to show that a 12-foot channel is practicable. In doing so the committee will make some comparisons of actual conditions as to the two rivers, with no intention to make them invidious.

"We believe that a 12-foot channel is practicable for both rivers and that a wise economy in their improvement will keep this ultimate result constantly in view, especially in making contracts with private persons and corporations for building locks and dams in consideration of the grant of the use of water power.

"LEADING AND CONTROLLING CONDITIONS AS TO THE SUCCESSFUL NAVIGATION OF THE TWO RIVERS WITH A CHANNEL OF 6 FEET, 9 FEET, OR OF 12 FEET.

"First, as to the water supply to give and maintain a 12-foot depth of channel at all seasons of the year:

"The altitude of Tennessee River at Knoxville above sea level is 792 feet.

"The length of the river to Paducah is 652 miles.

"The average fall per mile is 0.79 foot.

"The velocity at the lowest stage of water at Knoxville is 1.75 feet per second, and the volume is 3,000 cubic feet per second.

"At Paducah the velocity of the Tennessee River is 1 foot per second, and the volume is 10,000 cubic feet per second.

"Ohio River at Pittsburg is 699 feet above sea level.

"The length of the river to Paducah is 917 miles.

"The average fall per mile is not given in any official report.

"The velocity at the lowest stage of water at Pittsburg is not given in any official report.

"At Paducah the velocity of Tennessee River is 1 foot per second and the discharge is 10,000 cubic feet per second. Major Kingman states in his report that the volume of water of Ohio River at Pittsburg is about half as great at the same stage of water as that of the Tennessee at Knoxville, while the two rivers are equal in the volume of water at their junction at Paducah.

"The two rivers being identical in volume at Paducah, and a 9-foot channel for the Ohio being a proper depth of navigation to Pittsburg, as fixed by acts of Congress, there can be no reason why that depth of channel is not practicable to Knoxville, where the volume of water is twice as great as it is at Pittsburg. The rivers that empty into the Ohio below Pittsburg are larger and longer than those that flow into the Tennessee below Knoxville, which accounts for gain in the volume of water of the Ohio at Paducah, where it equals that of the Tennessee.

"Tennessee River has ample water to supply a channel as deep as 12 feet between Knoxville and Paducah, if such a channel is ever needed; but that depth of channel being available in both the great rivers equalizes their claims for improvement upon the common level of a 12-foot channel and, for the present, this draft of vessels is as deep as the Mississippi River can float across its obstructions at its lowest stage of water.

"These facts settle the great primary question that the maximum depth of the Ohio and Tennessee rivers, to be established as the basis of future improvements, should be 12 feet, and at present it should be 9 feet. And, this point being settled, the approximation to either depth in each river in their further improvement is a question of public convenience.

"While rivalry and competition between these great water courses is for the public good, and is commendable, an improvident or unjust discrimination against either of them is a wrong to the entire country, and is a positive disadvantage to the commerce of both rivers and to the people who reside upon or near to each of them.

"A boat loaded with commerce at Pittsburg and destined to Knoxville has as much right to the convenient navigation of Tennessee River as it would have on Mississippi River if it was destined to New Orleans.

"OBSTRUCTIONS.

"On the Ohio and Tennessee rivers it has been found necessary to abandon the natural channel at some of the obstructions in order to connect the navigable waters of each, which extend, in full volume, for hundreds of miles above and below such natural obstructions that can only be surmounted by canalization along their banks.

"In this respect the expenditures for constructing such canals has been and will be much the same on both rivers if they are controlled by a regard to economy.

"But whatever such expenditures may be, to the extent that they are necessary, they are indispensable as a duty resting upon the Government.

"The canal at Louisville, on Ohio River, is likely to require larger expenditures, in the long run, than Colbert Shoals and Muscle Shoals canals, both for construction and maintenance, because of the permanent character of the land through which the Tennessee River canals are constructed, and because Ohio River and its tributaries are, largely, silt-bearing and ice-obstructed streams, while the reverse is true of Tennessee River and its tributaries.

"These are material and very important advantages in favor of Tennessee River in respect of the sums of money that will be necessary to give it a 12-foot channel, or any lesser depth, between Knoxville and Paducah, and the still more important matter of the maintenance of its navigation through all coming time.

"Ohio River has a natural obstruction for about three months in each year, in the freezing of its waters, as far to the south as Louisville, and in the ice flow along its channel in the spring season, which is perilous to shipping. No such obstructions exist in Tennessee River.

"EFFECT ON FOREIGN COMMERCE.

"Times will occur, when the isthmian canal has become the great highway for the steamers that bear the commerce of the great oceans on the shortest direct lines of navigation between the coasts of all maritime countries, that a constant and full supply of steaming coals to supply these fleets will be of importance to the whole world.

"Then access by interior waters to the coal fields of the Appalachian Mountains throughout the year will be an affair of great national necessity as well as of commercial importance.

"Mississippi River up to Cairo, the Tennessee and Ohio rivers up to Paducah, and Tennessee River up to its head of navigation are the only water courses, except the Cumberland and the Alabama, that can open the way to the coals of the Appalachian Mountains throughout the year, and their importance is accordingly magnified.

"PRESENT LEGAL DEPTH OF TENNESSEE RIVER.

"In Tennessee River, which nature has relieved from the shifting of ice and sand bars, the present depth of the channel, as provided by law, is 6 feet at Colbert shoals. Five feet is the depth of water on the miter sills of the Muscle Shoals Canal.

"In the Ohio River, which requires constant care and large expenditures to provide against these shifting obstructions, the depth fixed by law is 9 feet on the miter sills of the locks between Pittsburg and Morgantown, on the Monongahela River.

"NEW DEPARTURE.

"This legislation on Government account as to the upper reaches of the Ohio River and the legislation, below set out, as to the central division of Tennessee River, on a contractual basis between the Government and private persons or corporations, virtually establishes the basis of 12 feet as the depth to be given in due season to all the canals and channels on both rivers.

"The principle is also adopted that it is lawful and expedient that locks and dams may be constructed by private enterprise and capital, in consideration of the perpetual right to use the water power which they will produce. The success of this plan is already demonstrated in the cost of the dam to be constructed at Hales bar, below Chattanooga, as to which the committee will copy the act approved April, 1904, in an appendix (A A).

"This new plan of cooperative work in river improvement is also applied, by acts of Congress, to the upper waters of the Cumberland and other rivers under varying contracts. This plan, or expedient, is founded upon the money value of the water power generated in the shoal places of many rivers that can be made navigable only by removing or controlling such obstructions.

"For creating horsepower there can be no substitute for water power in respect of cheapness of production, the cost of maintenance, or the unfailing and perpetual use, and its superior value and convenience, when used in connection with electricity or compressed air in all stationary work, give to it a money value that is far above that of any mines of coal or other fuel for such purposes that would produce the same amount of power.

"The human arm must, at last, prepare all fuel for use in generating power by steam, while the unfailing force of nature supplies this power perpetually and without cost.

"We have reached the point of time in which the sedate consideration of the value of water power must prevail. It is already among the greatest actual reenforcements of the money resources of the Government, aside from taxation, in the improvement of the navigation of all our mountain water courses. This new departure has come to stay, and it is a grand step in our progress.

"PRESENT DUTY OF THE GOVERNMENT AS TO TENNESSEE RIVER FROM KNOXVILLE TO PADUCAH.

"The first duty to be performed and the manifest necessity in respect of the navigation of Tennessee River is to remove or submerge all obstructions between Knoxville and Paducah, so as to secure a depth of water across them of not less than 6 feet, to correspond with the depth of water on the miter sills of the canal lock at Colbert shoals.

"This work of necessity and justice is demanded by the laws of the United States that fix the depth of water on the miter sills of the lock at Colbert shoals.

"The depth of water on the miter sills of the canals and at other places on these rivers has reference only to the draft of the vessels that are to navigate them.

"Twelve feet is assumed to be the maximum depth of channel on both rivers to answer the purposes of commerce in the distant future, while a depth of 6 feet is the minimum that is required for the present actual needs of that commerce, and a depth of 9 feet is the most moderate demand of justice.

"It is due to justice that in the progress of deepening the channels of both rivers to 12 feet they should receive equal assistance from Congress.

TWELVE-FOOT LEVEL—ITS COST AND VALUE.

"At first view it may seem that the deepening of the channel of Tennessee River from Knoxville to Paducah to 6, 9, or 12 feet is a venture that will require too great an expenditure to make its contemplation a question of any practical importance. So it seemed in 1862–1864 as to a transcontinental railroad line between San Francisco and Omaha. Yet that line was completed in a short time and with little ultimate cost to the Government.

"Five great transcontinental lines have been added to the list in less than fifty years, and Mexico, at Tehuantepec, and Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Honduras are all at work building four other transisthmian railroad lines to connect the great oceans.

"In the meantime we have paid a newly created government $10,000,000 and a bankrupt French company $40,000,000 for the Panama Railroad, with the privilege of expending three to five hundred million dollars in digging a canal which, when constructed, will destroy the Panama Railroad as a means of commercial transportation between the oceans, and will be a virtual loss of its value, which is not less than $25,000,000.

"The mere demands of commerce have thus committed the United States and our people and other governments to expenditures for transportation facilities that run up into several billion dollars, and 'the end is not yet.'

"The United States, after all these expenditures by our own and other governments and peoples, plunges headlong into additional depths of unknown expenditure in order to find a cheaper line of transit between the great oceans and to gain the power to regulate the cost of overland transportation by rail through the only possible means, which is competitive transportation by water. Can any mind grasp the magnitude or resist the pressure of this demand of commerce for highways of transportation by water?

"All the lines in existence and all that are in contemplation at present use steam power, generated by coal exclusively, as their motive power. The power of the winds is, so far, excluded from use, and coal is the sole reliance of all this mighty effort.

"Tennessee River, with a 12-foot channel, can furnish coal to all these transcontinental roads south of Canada, and to the isthmian canal, their competitor and regulator, cheaper and in more abundant and certain supply from the stores laid up in the Appalachian Range, as far to the north as West Virginia and as far to the south as Alabama, than it can be supplied to them through any other highway of commerce.

"It is equally accessible to a canal at Colon and to all the railways that cross the Mississippi and Missouri rivers.

"The cost of a 12-foot channel in the Tennessee River is a negligible sum when compared with such expenditures in railway and canal construction and maintenance.

"They can get their needed supply of motive power at all seasons and under all conditions from this river, to a great extent, and they will be compelled to seek their supply from this grand reservation of steam-generating fuel.

"Nothing can defeat the fixed destiny of Tennessee River as the main channel through which this article of commerce must be transported to the seaboard and to the western watershed of the Mississippi River, and, therefore, no other water course is more valuable to the country.

"The cost of a 12-foot channel from Knoxville to Paducah is inconsiderable when it is compared to these national benefits and necessities.

"CANALS AROUND THE GREAT OBSTRUCTIONS ON BOTH RIVERS.

"On Tennessee River there are three great levels or elevations caused by the crossing of three ledges of rock, one at Colbert Shoals and another at Muscle Shoals and the third in the mountain section of the river below Chattanooga.

"From Colbert Shoals to Paducah the river falls 0.374 foot per mile. From the head of Muscle Shoals Canal to Colbert Shoals the distance is about 60 miles, and the fall of the river is 2.73 feet per mile.

"From Knoxville to Chattanooga the distance is 188 miles, and the fall per mile is 0.956 of a foot.

"These great rock obstructions detain the water at these points and check its swift flow to the channel of the Mississippi, which would otherwise prevent navigation. At low water the drain of the pools of deeper waters, now accumulated above these great natural dams, would convert them into swift and shallow currents. No navigation for commercial purposes would have been possible in any part of the Tennessee River in the absence of these great natural dams.

"This is also true as to the ledge of rock that crosses Ohio River at Louisville, and its removal would drain the Ohio of its waters so rapidly that for a great distance it would become too shallow and swift for useful navigation.

"These conditions create the necessity for maintaining these barriers at their present height, and for making the rivers above them navigable by means of locks and dams.

"Where canalization or locks and dams are practicable they should be adopted in preference to cutting deeper channels through these great rock ledges and allowing the water an unobstructed course to lower levels.

"CHATTANOOGA OBSTRUCTION.

"A short distance below Chattanooga an obstruction is found across the river formed by bowlders that have come from mountain sides between which the river flows, forming a riprap dam that is about 600 feet in width, and is built up on a base rock until at low water it is covered only to the depth of 15 inches. The removal of this obstruction would drain off the waters at Chattanooga and for a long distance above until navigation for commercial uses would be practically destroyed.

"HALES BAR.

"A dam across Tennessee River at a point several miles below this riprap dam will be constructed, under the recent act of Congress, with a lock of sufficient height to give a depth of water of 35 feet across it.

"There is no practicable ground around this obstruction in which a canal could be cut. This dam and its lock, when constructed, will cover every obstruction in the river to the depth of at least 9 feet as far as the crossing of the bridge of the Queen and Crescent Railroad, 5 miles above Chattanooga, and for a still greater distance. The removal of 3 feet from the top of three or four small intervening shoals would give 12 feet of navigable water, for the distance of 40 miles, through the most difficult part of Tennessee River, if not for a much increased distance.

"This splendid scheme of cooperation between the Government and private enterprise opens the inquiry as to the extension of a 12-foot channel to Knoxville and from Hales bar to Lock A of the Muscle Shoals Canal. The committee agree that no rough or overdrawn conjecture is made in the suggestion that a 12-foot channel can be had, with decided economy and advantage over the present system, for this distance, by putting in dams and locks of 15 to 30 feet in height at suitable locations.

"These locks and dams, estimated at $1,000,000 each, which is probably twice the actual cost, would be eagerly taken by private capital, and constructed for the use of the water power, as is being done at Hales bar.

"CANAL FROM BROWNS ISLAND TO FLORENCE.

"This part of the river has peculiar features, that require separate examination and treatment.

"It covers a distance of 31 miles, of which 18 are included in the Muscle Shoals Canal, which is separated into two sections by an open river channel of about 8 miles. This section is on the southern border of the river. At Locks A and B the canal is 3½ miles long. The section on the northern border of the river is 14½ miles long from Lock No. 1 to Lock No. 9.

"From Lock No. 9 to Florence is about 7 miles. In this reach of the open river an obstruction, called the Little Muscle Shoals, dams up the water in a deep pool that extends about 1 mile below Lock No. 9.

"On Little Muscle Shoals a series of islands extends parallel to the northern shore of the river, from this pool to Florence, with short intervals between them. Between this chain of islands and the northern bank of the river is a shallow, swift channel about 6 miles long, through which steamboats ascend to Lock No. 9 of the canal.

"This channel is about 120 feet wide and, at low water, its depth in several places is about 16 inches. This channel, which is the only means of access to Lock No. 9 by steamboats, is a heavy handicap on the ascending navigation of Tennessee River, and needs improvement.

"The depth of water on the miter sills of the canal is 5 feet, but in the channel just described and in the open stretch of river between Lock No. 1 and Lock B, the depth of water over shoal places is frequently less than 2 feet.

"To get a depth of 12 feet at all points between Florence and Browns Island, the work required is a low dam and lock across the steamboat channel at Florence, not exceeding 15 feet in height, and a lock and dam at the best point between Lock B and Lock No. 1, probably not to exceed 15 feet in height.

"The water on the miter sills of the eleven locks on the canal can be deepened to 12 feet by raising the dams and locks to the proper height on the present structures.

"The cost of this addition to the capacity of the locks is very slight as compared with the benefits of the navigation they will afford.

"The extent and value of the water power between Browns Island and Florence will be discussed under a head that relates to the general subject of the water power of the Tennessee River and its principal affluents.

"This water power, if it is disposed of with the care it deserves, will be an asset of great value to the Government. It can not be doubted that a dam at Florence, to extend from Pattons Island to the south bank of Tennessee River, will furnish a power that is equal to the dam that will be constructed at Hales bar, below Chattanooga; and its location in the center of industry that is already concentrating many millions of dollars through private enterprise, where the only motive power is furnished by coal mined in the Birmingham coal fields, will make this water power as valuable as any in the United States.

"The committee present the following suggestions of an able and experienced man who has spent fifteen years in practical work on Tennessee River, in the central and western divisions, as to the probable work needed to give a channel between Knoxville and Paducah at the depths of 6, 9, and 12 feet, which they adopt as being entirely practicable and as presenting plans for the improvement of the river that are based on its actual condition ascertained by Government surveys and meet the requirements of the present and future:

"FIRST SECTION—PADUCAH TO RIVERTON.

"Six-foot depth.—The project for this depth is by dredging, which is now under way. The estimate of 1898 showed the necessary dredging to be 653,819 cubic yards, fully half of which amount has since been done.

"Nine-foot depth.—The 'open-river' method will probably be found best and most economical for this depth, and a large part of the work so done will be of use when changed from 9 to 12 foot depth.

"Twelve-foot depth.—This would probably require additional locks and dams. The total fall is 79 feet. If the dams are of the fixed type, four would suffice for the whole reach; if of a movable type, ten would be required.

"SECOND SECTION—RIVERTON TO FLORENCE.

"Six-foot depth.—The project now being worked out includes a lateral canal around Colbert and Bee Tree shoals, which is in an advanced state of completion. Above Colbert Shoals Canal only dredging and regulating works will be needed, the cost of which will be small.

"Nine-foot depth.—This would be possible by regulation, but as locks and dams would be necessary to accomplish the next stage (12 feet) in development it would be better to adopt locks and dams for the 9-foot project. If of the fixed type, one lock and dam would do. If of the movable type, two would be required.

"Twelve-foot depth.—This can be reached by adding to heights of structures for 9-foot channel.

"These observations are extended to other sections of the river as far as Knoxville in the following synoptical form:

"SECTION FROM FLORENCE TO HALES BAR.

"Little Muscle Shoals, Florence to Lock 9.—Improvement of this stretch will undoubtedly be made by canalization of the river. If done for the improvement of navigation alone, it will probably be accomplished by two additional locks and dams. If done by a combination of channel improvement and water power development, one lock and dam would probably be resorted to. Passage from one stage of development to another would be done by increasing heights and dimensions of structures, so as to provide for channels of 9 or 12 foot depths.

"SECTION FROM LOCK A TO HALES BAR.

"The distance is 143 miles; fall, 59 feet. While this reach could be improved by regulation up to 6-foot depth, to carry the improvement farther would require locks and dams; so that it would be better to start with that method in the beginning. If of the fixed type, three locks and dams would suffice. The movable type would require seven or eight; that is, if the lifts adopted on Ohio River be used.

"SECTION FROM HALES BAR TO CHATTANOOGA.

"With a small amount of dredging at the upper end of the pool, a channel of 12 feet will be obtained by the construction of the lock and dam to built at Hales bar.

"SECTION FROM CHATTANOOGA TO KNOXVILLE.

"The distance is 188 miles; total fall, 180 feet. Improvement for all three depths of water in channel (6, 9, and 12 feet) would be by locks and dams. If they are of the fixed type, 9 locks and dams would do it; if of the movable type, it would require 24. It is likely that the former would be adopted, as it is expected that the dam now being built by private enterprise at Hales bar will create such a demand for similar privileges at other places on the river that most of the river's improvement will be done in a similar way. That dam being permanent and 35 feet high, no navigation for boats and rafts in high water would be practicable. In high or low water the use of the lock would be necessary.

"Movable types of dams are usually designed for small heads of water, and the water power so developed would be so irregular that water-power schemes in connection with them would not be sought after.

"The cost per lock and dam (movable type) on Ohio River is given, in round numbers, as $1,000,000, and it is probable that the cost per foot of lift would be about the same whether fixed or movable dams were used.

"It might be well, in this connection, to consider the possibility of Muscle Shoals Canal being done away with and locks and dams being substituted therefor, the latter to be built by private enterprise for water-power purposes.

"In these comprehensive and accurate notes the actual situation on the entire river up to Knoxville is summarized, and a plan of permanent improvement, at either of three depths of channel, is set forth that is practicable at a low cost. The saving that will be made by a permanent, systematic, and progressive improvement of the navigation of the river will be the wisest economy. It will cause the wasteful expenditures, which are largely the result of local jealousies, to disappear, and capital, population, and enterprise will rapidly respond to the encouragement thus given by a settled policy of the Government.

"A million dollars, average, for locks and dams on Tennessee River is a great sum in the aggregate, and is most likely twice the actual cost. But at $1,000,000 each they are not half the sum of the subsidies given by the Government to a single transcontinental railroad. When these locks and dams are paid for by private parties, as nearly all of them will be in consideration of the value of the water power created by them, the movement takes such a form of public and private benefit to all concerned that its blessings to the whole country are beyond computation."

Mr. President, I have presented these extracts from the committee's report, not as a full synopsis or complete analysis, but to give in as brief compass as possible some information of the subject of which it treats. The fact that our committee was charged by the Senate with the duty of inquiring into the question of improving the navigation of the Tennessee River is a gratifying indication of something more than a local interest in a matter which is truly national in its importance. There is one suggestion in this report which I hope may find a permanent lodgment in the mind of Congress—that is, that the question of improving our navigable waterways and of opening up the vast undeveloped wealth of the country should not be the subject of rivalry and contention between States and localities, but a common and general purpose intelligently directed and systematically applied. A common effort to obtain from Congress adequate appropriations for the improvement of all our navigable streams will result in larger, more effective, and therefore more economical expenditure. The general struggle to get a pittance out of a scanty appropriation results in wasteful and profligate expenditure. There should be an end to this mutually destructive antagonism between interests deserving the aid of Congress. Especially should there be no disposition to abandon the improvement of smaller but commercially important tributaries. The mighty Mississippi is conceded the first claim upon the national appropriations; but the tributaries to the Mississippi are tributaries indeed, and the larger the volume of commerce they are enabled to bear the larger and more abundant tribute will they bring to the king river of all.

In the committee's report the fact is emphasized that the Cumberland and the Tennessee should be dealt with as one system. There have been indications of a purpose to abandon projected improvements on the former river; yet I assert that every dollar expended for such purpose would yield $10 in increased wealth and commerce.

The distinguished chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House [Mr. BURTON] once said that when a waterway has a tonnage of over a hundred thousand per annum it is worthy of the attention and of the fostering care of Government, and that when the value of the commerce on the waterway exceeds $1,000,000 per annum it has been taken out of the category of streams which are insignificant.

The engineer's report of the commerce of the Cumberland River for the year 1900 shows that the tonnage of this river was nearly 700,000 tons and its estimated value nearly $14,000,000, excluding the revenue from the carriage of passengers. Its tonnage is seven times greater than the standard fixed by Mr. BURTON and its value fourteen times greater, and yet, as important as is this commerce now, it is insignificant compared with what it will be when the river is made navigable throughout the year.

Mr. President, just a little of the money expended on battle ships which we do not need, a very small fraction of the money which we have dumped into tropical jungles would add untold millions to the wealth and commerce of this country. The chairman of the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors has raised his voice in protest against the enormous appropriations for naval purposes, as necessarily reducing the fund available for the improvement of our waterways. I am glad the President himself has at last seen the necessity of calling a halt. I take some pride in the fact that more than seven years ago I uttered my feeble warning that this very condition would come to pass—that our rivers and harbors would have to suffer because of the reckless and costly policy of adventure upon which we had entered. But hereafter when the just demands of the people are met with the objection that the revenues of the Government will not bear the cost, let us insist that the Government shall save the dollar which bears no fruit, rather than the dollar which yields thirty, sixty, or a hundred fold.

JOSEPH BRUNELL, SR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first pension bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 2871) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Brunnell was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Brunell, sr., late of Company B, Hatche's Independent Battalion Minnesota Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Joseph Brunell, sr."

SABASTIAN LAUDNER.

The bill (S. 136) granting an increase of pension to Sabastian Laudner was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, after the words "late of," to insert "Company H, Fifth Regiment, and;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sabastian Laudner, late of Company H, Fifth Regiment, and Company H, Sixth Regiment, West Virginia Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK LE HUNDRA.

The bill (S. 139) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Le Hundra was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to insert "twenty-four;" so as to make the bill read.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frederick Le Hundra, late of U. S. S. Powhatan, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS WELCH.

The bill (S. 2526) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Welch was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, after the words "late of," to insert "Company C, Fourteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Welch, late of Company C, Fourteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and Company M, Seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RACHEL A. FOULK.

The bill (S. 2869) granting an increase of pension to Rachel A. Foulk was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rachel A. Foulk, widow of Philip K. Foulk, late of Company F, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMILY PETERSON.

The bill (S. 476)) granting an increase of pension to Emily Peterson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emily Peterson, widow of Peter Peterson, late of Company H, Eleventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER M. SCOTT.

The bill (S. 2459) granting an increase of pension to Alexander M. Scott was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the word "late," to strike out "of" and insert "first lieutenant;" and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alexander M. Scott, late first lieutenant Company B, Forty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the second amendment, in line 8, by making the amount $40 instead of $30, as recommended by the committee. I move this amendment on information which has come to me through the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] since the report was made.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendments as amended were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SIGNAL-SERVICE MONUMENT AT GETTYSBURG.

The bill (S. 2172) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to cause to be erected monuments and markers on the battlefield of Gettysburg, Pa., to commemorate the valorous deeds of certain regiments and batteries of the United States Army," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to so amend the act as to include a monument to commemorate the services of the United States Signal Service during the war of the rebellion, and for that purpose appropriates $7,500.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN CROSS OF HONOR.

The bill (S. 3045) to incorporate the American Cross of Honor within the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK OF GRAHAM, VA.

The bill (S. 2582) to authorize the American National Bank of Graham, Va., to change its location and name was read.

Mr. KEAN. It wish to ask what is the necessity for this bill? I do not see any letter from the Comptroller of the Currency. I understand that two-thirds of the shareholders of the stock of the bank can change the name at any time, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency. I do not see anything in the report on the point. I only want to know the necessity for the act.

Mr. LODGE. As the Senator who has charge of the bill is not present I suggest that it go over.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the bill, of course.

Mr. SCOTT. An act may be necessary because it is to change the location from one State to another. The bank is now located in old Virginia, and the bill provides for changing it to Bluefield, W. Va. That may be the reason.

Mr. KEAN. I do not see in the report any letter from the Comptroller of the Currency.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Select Committee on National Banks with amendments, in line 3, to strike out "the" where it first occurs and insert "The;" and after the words "West Virginia," in line 7, to insert "and its corporate title to The American National Bank of Bluefield;" so as to make the first section read:

That The American National Bank of Graham, now located at Graham, Tazewell County, State of Virginia, is hereby authorized to change its location, or place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on, to the town of Bluefield, Mercer County, State of West Virginia, and its corporate title to The American National Bank of Bluefield, by and with the consent of the Comptroller of the Currency, whenever the shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of said bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, determine to make such change: Provided, That there shall be sent to the Comptroller of the Currency a duly authenticated notice of the vote for removal and change of title. The change of location and title, however, shall not be valid until the Comptroller of the Currency shall have issued his certificate of approval.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL LAND OFFICE IN NORTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 2452) creating an additional land office in the State of North Dakota was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out the first section of the bill in the following words:

That all that portion of North Dakota lying north of the twelfth standard parallel and west of the range line between ranges 92 and 93 west of the principal meridian be, and the same is hereby, created into a separate land district, to be known as the Williston district; and the land office for said district shall be located at the town of Williston until such time as the President may, in his discretion, remove the site of said land office from said town.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That all that portion of North Dakota lying north of the twelfth standard parallel and west of the line beginning at the juncture of the range line between ranges 92 and 93 with the said twelfth standard parallel and running north to the fifteenth standard parallel, and thence west along the said fifteenth standard parallel to the range line between ranges 96 and 97, and thence north along the said range line to the international boundary line, all west of the principal meridian, be, and the same is hereby, created in a separate land district, to be known as the Williston district; and the land office for said district shall be located at the town of Williston until such time as the President may, in his discretion, remove the site of said land office from said town.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I notice a clause in the bill where the Constitution is reenacted very industriously, and I question the necessity for it. It is the clause authorizing the President to fill up vacancies which may occur in the recess of the Senate. I move to strike it out, if the clerks can turn to it.

Mr. KEAN. It is in the second section.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is nothing new to reenact the Constitution. I will say to the Senator that it is done here all the time.

Mr. SPOONER. Although the Senator says it is quite customary to reenact the Constitution, it is equally customary to forget it after it is reenacted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin moves an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 2, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "or during the recess thereof and until the next session after such appointment."

Mr. SCOTT. I suggest that the bill go over. Neither of the Senators from North Dakota is here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HANSBROUGH subsequently said: I should like to have the Senate return to the bill that was just passed over creating a land district in North Dakota.

Mr. SCOTT. I withdraw my objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 2, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "or during the recess thereof and until the next session after such appointment."

Mr. SPOONER. It is not only unnecessary, but it is a misrepresentation of the constitutional provision.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY DENTAL SURGEONS.

The bill (S. 2355) to regulate the corps of dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department of the Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that bill may very well go over. It is a matter of great importance, and the Senate is not very attentive.

Mr. SCOTT. It is a very important bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over.

SURVEY OF HARBOR ON LAKE MICHIGAN.

The next business on the Calendar was the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. HEMENWAY and reported by Mr. ALGER from the Committee on Commerce, providing for a survey to be made at a point opposite Lake County, Ind.

Mr. SCOTT. I suggest that the resolution go over, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] is not here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution will go over.

Mr. HEMENWAY subsequently said: I ask the Senate to return to Order of Business 574.

Mr. SCOTT. I objected to the concurrent resolution. The Senator from Indiana is now here, and I withdraw my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made with a view to providing a harbor suitable for the largest boats at a point opposite or near the following-described land: Sections Nos. 33 and 34, township 37, range 8 west, Lake County, Ind.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

INDIAN LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

The bill (S. 2787) to amend the act of Congress approved February 11, 1901, entitled "An act providing for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians of the La Pointe or Bad River Reservation, in the State of Wisconsin," was read.

Mr. SPOONER. Who reported the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE]. The bill was introduced by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. SPOONER. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over.

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 529.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

CAPE MENDOCINO (CALIFORNIA) LIGHT KEEPER'S QUARTERS.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Commerce has but one more bill on the Calendar, Senate bill 2273, and I should like unanimous consent to dispose of it.

Mr. KEAN. Does it provide a light-house for the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; it does not. It is for the house of a light keeper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2273) to establish at Cape Mendocino, California, quarters for the light keeper.

The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $5,500 to construct at Cape Mendocino, California, quarters for the accommodation of the light keeper.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] objected to a clause in the bill which limits the subvention to any particular vessel to the term of ten years. I said to the Senator that I would give the matter careful and "prayerful" consideration, which I have done. I am fully persuaded that the Senator from Wisconsin was entirely right in his contention, and that the bill will be greatly improved by eliminating from it that provision. I therefore move to strike out on page 10, line 5, commencing with the word "but," down to and including the word "years," in line 7.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 10 of the bill, reprint of January 30, in line 5, after the word "time," strike out the words "but no vessel shall receive a subvention under the provisions of section 2 of this act for a longer period than ten years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I believe there is a general provision in the bill that no vessel shall receive any subvention unless it shall be rated A1.

Mr. GALLINGER. A steam vessel.

Mr. FRYE. That remains?

Mr. GALLINGER. That remains.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire one or two questions for information. In the bill as originally reported there was a provision to add to the compensation of two existing steamship lines the sum of about half a million dollars a year for eight or nine or ten years, making four or five million dollars in all for steamship lines. Is that provision yet in the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. The provision relating to the so-called "American Line" is stricken from the bill. The provision relating to the Oceanic Steamship Line, plying between San Francisco and Australasia, remains in the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to ask the Senator if the amount of compensation a steamship company was already receiving under its contract with the Government covered fully the entire cost of officering and manning the steamships—the captain, the several officers, cabin boys, the engineers, the sailors, and all combined—would he yet think that such a steamship line should have an addition to the price it has already agreed to carry the mails for?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that depends upon circumstances. I think I can state some circumstances connected with this line that will suggest to the Senator that possibly it would need more than that.

This is a great line of steamships plying between San Francisco and the Orient, including New Zealand, Australia, and some other important points. The Commission, after a very careful consideration of this matter, was fully persuaded that the line is losing a very large amount of money every year. Personally I have no doubt on that point. It is a mattter well known to some of us, because we have the information from our consuls that a great Japanese steamship company, which is running in competition with this line under a very heavy subsidy from the Japanese Government—much greater than we are giving the Oceanic Steamship Company—is now negotiating for the purchase of that line, and I have no doubt if we do not come to the relief of this great steamship company and aid it to some extent in its terrific struggle to sustain itself against these heavily subsidized Japanese steamships, the American steamships will go under a foreign flag after a time. I have not any question in my mind about it.

I do not know whether the Senator's mathematics would show to his satisfaction that these steamships could be run upon the basis he suggests, but I reach the conclusion, upon the best information I can obtain, that the Oceanic Steamship Company is in dire need of help to save it to the American flag.

Mr. PATTERSON. Whatever may be said about subsidies for lines not already in existence, it seems to me that where a steamship line is in existence and that steamship line has made a contract with the Government for the carrying of the mails—the same contract that was made seven, eight, nine, or ten years ago, and that was renewed at the solicitation of the steamship company perhaps less than a year ago—the proposition to give to such a steamship line a large sum of money, amounting, perhaps, during the term of its contract to somewhere in the neighborhood of two million or two million and a half dollars, has no merit whatever to stand upon.

I happened to see—and I read with some interest—a statement made by this identical steamship company, and I think made with a view of influencing this kind of legislation in its behalf. It was a recent statement, and it shows that the amount of money it was receiving from the Government for carrying the mails exceeded in amount the entire sum paid per annum by this company for every human being, from the highest to the lowest in the steerage, if they have such a place, and already receiving an amount exceeding the sum total of all that was paid for manning the vessel. The proposition is now to give it something over $200,000 a year additional.

Mr. President, why a steamship company thus provided for in the way of compensation for merely carrying the mails can not compete with a foreign vessel is more than I can comprehend. It may buy its coal in whatever markets it will; it may provision its vessels in whatever markets it will; it may hire its crew, except its officers, in whatever markets it will; it has some advantages over foreign ships in the ports of the United States. Now, when the Government pays to such a company a sum sufficient to pay for its entire navigation force, it seems to me it is stretching this matter of subsidy to an alarming and extraordinary extent.

A steamship company with a contract with the Government comes to Congress and causes Senators to believe that it will repudiate its own contract with the Government unless the Government will double the compensation it is already paying it on that account, and the committee or Commission listens and submits to the demand. It seems to me that when a company thus situated comes to Congress in that attitude, giving Congress and the country to understand that its contract to carry the mails will be of no binding force whatever, but that it will abandon the flag and put up the flag of another country, has not much claim upon either the generosity or the extravagance of Congress. To go under the flag of another country, what for? Does it demonstrate to the Senator that the other country will do as the United States will do for carrying its mails, paying a sum largely in excess of that which is necessary to pay the entire force of the ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator know what subvention the Japanese line is getting that is running in competition with this company?

Mr. PATTERSON. No, Mr. President; I have not examined into the subventions or whatever other name may be given to this method of sustaining steamship companies. I simply know that here is a company already being most liberally paid, under a solemn contract, for carrying the mails, and it comes to the Senate committee and states to the Senate committee: "If you do not practically double what you are giving me, I will abandon the flag under which you made this contract; I will throw up the contract; I will force you to enter into a contract with some other company." And yet this is the word of the company itself, the word of the officials.

Mr. President, there is no doubt in my mind but that if it had not been known that this largess was being distributed and Congress was engaged in the business of handing out donations and bonuses to steamship companies this Pacific company would never have thought of suggesting a thing of that kind.

It would go on, as it has been going on in the neighborhood of ten years, performing its duty as a line of steamships, receiving the compensation that it contracted to receive, and, like an honest company, observe its contracts. It would not think of threatening Congress or repudiating its own contracts if it did not receive the sum that it demanded.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this is the most objectionable form of subsidy, subvention, or whatever it may be called, that this method of dealing with ship companies can take. Congress has been pretty liberal. The coastwise law is nothing but concession after concession to the shipping companies. The coastwise law is nothing more than a huge protection law compelling every industry in the United States that must use the coast waters to pay tribute to the shipping companies.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator will have to figure more than he has figured to make that appear.

Mr. PATTERSON. To make what appear?

Mr. GALLINGER. To make it appear that the coastwise service, protected as it is by statute, which forbids entrance into that service of foreign ships, exacts tribute from any industry. If the Senator will take the pains to investigate the matter, he will find that on the Great Lakes, where our ships are absolutely protected by our Federal statutes, they are carrying freight at a lower rate than it has ever been carried for any nation at any period in the history of the world. So nobody is paying tribute to them.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, this argument which is put forward in almost every controversy in which the question of protection is involved has but little force when the question of tariff and its revision and the lowering of schedules is proposed. That is the stock in trade of those who are defending the present system, namely, that prices are lower now than ever before, and that, therefore, this system should continue. Altered conditions, Mr. President, improved machinery of every kind, the large increase in the amount of traffic, the scientific methods of handling freight, may more than account for any reduction in freight rates on the Great Lakes or elsewhere; but a suggestion of that kind will have no effect on the proposition which I lay down, that the coastwise laws are nothing but a huge system of protection to the shipping companies, when it is reflected that, were it not for the coastwise laws, every foreign shipping company would have a right to send its vessels here and compete——

Mr. GALLINGER. And we would not have an American steamship in our coastwise trade under those circumstances—not one.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am not saying that that is not true.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is absolutely true.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am not saying that that is not true, but I am simply endeavoring to support my proposition that the coastwise law is simply a system of protection——

Mr. GALLINGER. We all admit that it is a species of protection.

Mr. PATTERSON. By which American shipping companies, under the law, are able to secure from shippers an immensely larger amount for the tonnage those companies carry than they would were the carriage of those freights open to the world. I do not know how many American companies there would be on the coast; I do not know how many foreign companies there would be on the coast; but I only make this suggestion because of the frequent arguments that are put forth, that are made to the West and the other sections of the country, that "We of the East and of the seacoast are generous to you, and you ought to be generous to us." The country, Mr. President, has been at all times generous to those who are engaged in going "down to the sea in ships"——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; literally, "go down."

Mr. PATTERSON. And more generous than it has been, in my opinion, to any other industry. Why, I think it was last year the shipping interests came in, or, at least, at the last Congress, and got a law amended by which all the carrying trade between the United States and the Philippines, after July of this year, is to go in American bottoms. If not modified in some way, that will compel the industries and interests of those islands to add probably more than 50 per cent, perhaps more than 100 per cent, to the sum they are now compelled to pay for transporting goods between the two sections of the world.

In addition to that, Mr. President, a bill was passed which I think compels the Navy, if not the Army—leaving some latitude, and but little, to the Navy Department—to have its transportation done in American bottoms.

There is no question but that these shipping interests are the most persistent lobbyists and the most successful lobbyists that have ever gathered at the capital of the country. The appeals which they make are wonderfully taking. When they describe the ocean and the ports of the world as being bare of the American flag, it immediately appeals to the patriotic sentiment of every Senator and of every Member of the other House. Therefore they are received with a great deal of toleration, and efforts are being constantly made to give them that which they are seeking. What I wanted to say was that in opposing this system of gifts the Senator, from whatever section of the country, who is not willing to vote for a subsidy of this kind is not guilty of want of generosity to ship companies, because, as I said before, the statute book bristles all over with evidences of the generosity of the United States to those who are engaged in the running of steamship lines or other lines. Therefore, when a proposition is as bald as the particular item that I have in mind, to practically double the amount of compensation to a steamship line that has been in existence for a number of years, its compensation being fixed by a contract to which it was a voluntary party, under a threat that "if you do not meet our demands we will not play with you any more; we will haul down the American flag, and will hoist the flag of Japan, or of Germany, or of France, or of Great Britain," it seems to me, Mr. President, that that at least is the line this Senate ought not to cross.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to reply in detail to the somewhat remarkable speech of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON]. It is true that our coastwise trade is protected by statutes; and the Senator is the first man during my term of public service to find fault with it.

Mr. PATTERSON. No, Mr. President, I have not found fault with it. I am attempting to meet the charge that is made so often—I have heard it at this session—that we are ungenerous not to meet this present demand. I am simply attempting to show that Congress has been generous, and generous almost to a fault.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator imagines he has heard something that he has not heard. There has been no such charge or suggestion made. What has been said is that we are ungenerous to our foreign steamship service; that there is no protection whatever given to those ships such as is given to our ships in the coastwise and the lake trade.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator says that this particular line of steamships, and possibly others, are here with a lobby and are here indulging in threats that if we do not yield to their demands they will transfer their ships to a foreign flag. I have not seen the lobby nor have I heard the threats. One gentleman from the Pacific coast did ask the privilege of appearing before the Merchant Marine Commission in reference to the Oceanic Steamship Company, and he made so good a case that the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], who probably will not vote for this bill, stated in his speech that he had no objection whatever to this increase of subvention. The Senator from Colorado will find it in the speech of the Senator from Florida. There has been no threat. Our consul at Yokohama—I believe it was he; I have sent for his report and I will see if I can get it, though I may not be able to get it to-day—has served notice on the Government of the United States that a proposition has been made by a great Japanese steamship line to purchase the steamships belonging to the Oceanic Line. I took occasion to verify that so far as I could, and I am fully persuaded that that negotiation is in progress to-day.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. If this gift shall be made this year and the consul at Yokohama the next year informs the Senate that Japan still wants to buy this line, would the Senator be willing to double the compensation then in order to keep it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I said the other day that I was not going into the realm of prophecy, and I will not engage in it to-day. We shall meet our obligations next year and the year after as they come to us. I do not know what I might do on this or any other proposition if I chanced to be here one year or two years from now.

Mr. President, we are not entirely in the dark about this matter. An inquiry was sent to the main office of the Oceanic Steamship Company at San Francisco asking what was likely to happen under existing conditions. The Senator speaks of that company violating their contract. I suppose a steamship company could, as could any other contractor, surrender its contract and forfeit its bonds, whatever amount they may be, and do it honorably. I have no doubt of that. I say an inquiry was sent to the office of the Oceanic Steamship Company, and this reply came back:

> Will not sell Oceanic steamships so long as have reasonable hope of keeping them under American flag. Fate of shipping bill will decide ours.

The Senator will probably say that that was a threat. I do not think it was at all. A representative of this company stated to us with a great deal of particularity—he was a man who has had long service in public life and whose reputation is untainted—that they were losing a very large amount of money every year; that they had kept those steamships afloat in the hope of something better coming to them; but that they have reached the parting of the ways, and that if the matter were to go along as it is now, they would necessarily have to surrender to the situation and pull down the flag of our country.

I want to say a word about the Oceanic Line. It is a line that runs to Australasia, and, I think, largely through its instrumentality, our trade with that country—with Australia and New Zealand—has been very largely increased in recent years. In the report of the Merchant Marine Commission we paid some attention to this, and said:

> The American line to Australasia operates in Pacific waters, where the cost of fuel, labor, etc., is considerably greater than at Atlantic ports.

The Senator suggested that it was not. We think it is, and we have investigated it.

> Secondly, the line is required to maintain a very high speed. Furthermore, the ships of the company employ exclusively white crews, instead of the Asiatics utilized by many other Pacific companies.
> This American line to Australasia not only performs the best service, but now receives the lowest compensation of all lines running to Australasian ports. The service is so regular and swift that great numbers of Australasian men of business, even when bound to Europe, are brought en route to the United States, and thereby become regular purchasers of American merchandise. The very heavy increase of our exports to British Australasia, from $12,674,000 in 1896 to $27,401,000 in 1904, is due, unquestionably, in a great degree to the extraordinary efficiency and regularity of the ill-paid American steamship service out of San Francisco.

This American line to Australasia consists of three relatively new American-built steel steamships—the Sonoma, Ventura, and Sierra, all of over 6,000 tons. This line is required to perform a 15-knot service, the fastest mail service entering Australasian waters. It receives from the United States a mail subvention, under the postal aid act of 1891, of $283,000 a year, or $16,659 a voyage, as compared with foreign lines to Australasia receiving in subsidy per voyage from $16,346 for the 13-knot service of the British Peninsular and Oriental Company, carrying Lascar crews, to $41,604 to the 13½-knot service of the North German Lloyd, and $47,814 to the 14-knot service of the Messageries Maritimes.

There is the situation. A company that is required to run at 15 knots an hour receives substantially the same subvention that a British company does for a service that runs 13 knots an hour, while it receives only about one-third of what the French company receives, and the French company carries Asiatics and Lascars in its crews, while this company carries white crews.

The British line from British Columbia to Australasia, having only twelve voyages a year and a 14-knot service, receives a subvention of $27,500 per voyage, as against $16,659 to the American Oceanic Line.

These American steamships employ white men exclusively. One-half of their crews must, by the terms of the contract, be Americans. These ships pay the highest wages in the world.

Mr. President, it was represented to the Commission—and the Commission believed it—that at the present time this company is losing from $200,000 to $300,000 a year, and, from what our consuls have written about this matter and from what this steamship company says in the telegram which I have quoted, I have no doubt as to what is going to happen unless something is done to relieve this company from the tremendous pressure under which it is at the present time because of the more highly subsidized slower steamship lines of other countries engaged in this trade.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Can the Senator inform us what is the cost of these steamers plying between San Francisco and Australia?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator always asks, or he has in this debate, questions that no living man can answer offhand. The Senator must know that. I know that a steamship that runs 15 knots an hour must cost more than one that runs 13; and that is the difference between these two steamship lines.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I imagine so. The Senator has certainly shown no lack of information in this debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are some things I do not know about steamships.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It was a compliment to the Senator. I assumed he knew what this cost was.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator. Perhaps the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], who lives on the Pacific coast, and is very familiar with steamships and all matters relating to them, can give an approximate reply—I do not think any Senator can give an accurate reply. I yield to the Senator from California for that purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in response to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], and, in doing so, I shall endeavor to answer the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I did not intend to say a word upon this question, for the reason that the Commission that has devoted nearly two years' time to the investigation of this subject visited San Francisco and there took testimony of the shipowners, of the seamen, of the agents of steamship and insurance companies, and others who are interested in navigating the ocean.

The Senator from Colorado impeaches the American patriotism of the owners of the Oceanic Steamship Company in having made a mail contract for ten years which they now propose—at least that is the inference from the Senator's remarks—if the Government does not increase their compensation with subsidy, to relinquish, forfeit their bond, and turn the line over to some foreign company to transport the mails.

I want to say that 99 per cent, or 95 per cent certainly, of the Oceanic Steamship Company, as I understand, is owned by the firm known as the Spreckles. Claus Spreckles, one of the principal owners, and his sons are among our most enterprising citizens on the Pacific coast. They entered into this transportation business, taking a mail contract between San Francisco and Australia and New Zealand, and for ten or fifteen years have been operating their ships at a loss. They are public-spirited men. They did not go into this enterprise for the purpose or expectation of making money, but to build up the maritime interests on the Pacific Ocean between California, Oregon, Washington, the Hawaiian Islands, the island of Samoa, the islands of the South Pacific, New Zealand, and Australia. They have done so, I think, very successfully, but, as they state in the paper to which the Senator referred, they have done it at an actual loss on mail route No. 75, of $375,349 per annum.

As has been stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] they pay the highest wages that are paid by any steamship company in the United States or in the world. They would not to-day come to Congress to——

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON. I simply want to say that the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] has confirmed what the Senator from California now says. He said publicly, in talking to me about this particular line of steamships, that it is one of the best and most worthy that is sailing ships upon the ocean. I do not in any way criticise or criminate the company that owns this line of steamers. It is the proposition that is involved in this bill and the facts associated with it that I criticise.

Mr. PERKINS. I am very glad indeed that my friend from Colorado does justice to the owners of this steamship company. The inference, then, from his remarks is, I suppose, that he wishes to reduce the wages that are paid by this company in order to enable them to successfully operate their steamships.

I want to say parenthetically that I do not believe the Oceanic Steamship Company would come to this Congress asking for one dollar's increase in the pay they are receiving, were it not for the subsidies that are paid to their competitors by other governments.

The Messageries Maritimes, a French company, receives a total subsidy, per voyage, of $47,814. The North German Lloyd, a German company, receives, per voyage, $41,604.

The Japanese company, the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, makes twelve trips per annum, and has a subsidy of $21,917 per voyage.

The Oceanic Steamship Company makes seventeen voyages annually, and receives $16,659 per voyage.

Mr. FRYE. For how many voyages a year?

Mr. PERKINS. Twelve voyages, at an average speed per voyage of 13½ knots.

I have here a table which gives in more detail the figures to which I have been referring. I ask that the table may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Speed, number of voyages, and subsidies received by seven steamship lines on Pacific coast.

Name.	Nationality.	Average speed on voyage.	Number of voyages annually.	Subsidy per voyage.	Total subsidy received.
Messageries Maritimes	French	14	13	$47,814	$621,587
North German Lloyd	German	13.5	12	41,604	499,245
Peninsular and Oriental	British	13	26	16,346	425,000
Orient	do	14	26	23,077	600,000
Nippon Yusen Kaisha	Japanese		12	21,917	263,000
Canadian-Australian	British	14	12	27,500	330,000
Oceanic Steamship Co	American	15	17	16,659	283,203

Mr. PERKINS. The Oceanic Steamship Company, as I have said, has been operated at an actual loss of $373,349 per annum. The present mail contract of the Asiatic Steamship Company provides for the payment of $2 per mile under the act of March 3, 1891, which gives them $283,203 per annum.

The wages paid by the Oceanic Steamship Company—the American line—amount to $235,440 per annum, as against wages paid by the Japanese company of $97,708.

The following, Mr. President, is a statement which strikingly illustrates the disadvantage under which the Oceanic Steamship Company labors in the matter of wages:

Total wages paid per annum.

Oceanic Line (American)	$235,440
If paid on the basis of Canadian-Australian Line (British)	176,690
If paid on the basis of Peninsular and Oriental (British and Lascar)	123,404
If paid on the basis of Orient Line (British and Lascar)	127,428
If paid on the basis of North German Lloyd (German)	129,492
If paid on the basis of Messageries Maritime (French)	129,492
If paid on the basis of Nippon Yusen Kaisha (Japanese)	97,708

I want to give you, Mr. President, a comparison of three ships. It is an object-lesson which I am sure will cause my friend from Colorado, if he gives it the consideration that I know he does every proposition, to at once reconsider his views and say: "No; we do not want this steamship company to reduce the wages of its seamen, firemen, and coal passers; we want to pay them the wages they are now receiving, because they are American citizens, or capable of becoming such. They have their homes and their families in San Francisco and other cities and ports of California, and their children are attending the public schools and growing up to be American citizens."

Now, in answer to my friend from Nevada, I will say that the Sonoma, the Ventura, and the Sierra, the three ships of the Oceanic Line, are of 6,100 tons each. They were built in Philadelphia by Cramp & Sons' Shipbuilding Company, at a cost, as I understand, of about $1,000,000 each.

I know the company issued bonds for $2,500,000, and I think there was at least $500,000 more necessary for the purpose of fitting out those ships in order to operate this route.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I made the inquiry regarding the cost of these ships, not for the purpose of applying it to any argument as to this particular service, but simply to obtain information as to the cost of a 6,000-ton ship.

The Senator from Florida told me the other day that it was estimated that the cost in American shipyards of the average ship which would be covered by this act would be about $60 per ton. My impression was that those ships cost very much in excess of that sum, and I wished to ascertain what is the average per ton of shipping. Of course it varies according to different classes with the——

Mr. PERKINS. According to the speed and the capacity and the model of the ship.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. A vessel might easily be built for $60 a ton to run 8 knots an hour, but one that would run 20 knots an hour would have to have machinery of eight times more power to develop the necessary horsepower.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And the additional cost is mainly in the machinery?

Mr. PERKINS. And the fittings of the ship, and the model.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator from Nevada inquired on that point, and I was not prepared definitely to reply. These ships are of a little over 6,000 tons.

Mr. PERKINS. Six thousand one hundred.

Mr. GALLINGER. One of them, the Sonoma, is six thousand two hundred and fifty-odd tons. There are now being built in the Cramp shipyards, for the Ward Line, four great steamships. Two of them are to take the place of the two ships purchased by the Government, and two additional ships are being built. Those ships, I think, are of about 6,000 tons, and the contract price, as I am credibly informed, is a little in excess of $900,000 each. They are high-speed ships.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That would be about a hundred and fifty dollars a ton?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; a hundred and fifty dollars a ton.

Mr. PERKINS. Recurring to the three ships I was about to use as an illustration showing the register, the number of men they carry, and the wages per man, I wish now to show my friend the Senator from Colorado why it is not possible for us on the Pacific coast to operate ships as cheaply as vessels are operated on the Atlantic coast and pay the wages we are now paying on the Pacific coast. First, we pay 30 per cent more for the coal we consume on the Pacific coast. We are obliged to bring it from Australia or British Columbia or other foreign ports, because we do not produce it in any of the Pacific coast States.

The American steamship Sonoma is, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, of 6,253 tons register.

Mr. PATTERSON. Upon the item of coal, have foreign steamships that ply between San Francisco and Asiatic ports any advantage over the American ships? Does not each vessel take on its cargo of coal wherever it is? Can it take on more than enough at one port to carry it out beyond another; and when the cost of an entire voyage is evened up, whether the vessel is an English vessel starting from Australasia and coming to an American port and then going around or an American vessel, when it is averaged up, has the foreign vessel in the item of coal any advantage over the American vessel?

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator is correct in that respect, but he forgets one fact in the illustration which has been made by the Senator from New Hampshire, in comparing the speed of these ships with those which run 13 knots. The ship that runs 16 or 17 knots, as those ships do, burns 33 per cent more fuel in order to get the speed than the ship running only 13 knots. It is one-third more.

Then, there is the matter of wages. I want to emphasize to my friend from Colorado this fact, and I desire him to take heed of it and answer it and give us a solution of this problem, because if we can wipe out the extra wages that we pay to our people or if we can induce foreign countries not to subsidize their ships, the Americans would ask no preference over any other country in the world.

The Sonoma is 6,253 tons. She carries 157 men, and her monthly pay roll is $6,540. The British steamship Orizaba, of 6,300 tons, carries 208 men, and her monthly pay roll is $3,534.96. The Japanese steamship America Maru, of 6,307 tons, carries 180 men, and her pay roll is $2,509. These ships are about the same tonnage and about the same speed. What is the average pay per month for each man? For the Japanese steamer, $13.95; for the British steamer, $17; for the American steamer Sonoma, the one that is running in this line, $41.65 per man. That is the average for the coal passer, the waiter, the fireman, and everyone on the ship. I will present these facts in tabular form:

Vessel.	Register.	Number of men.	Monthly pay roll.	Average per man.
American steamship Sonoma	6,253	157	$6,540.00	$41.65
British steamship Orizaba	6,300	208	3,534.96	17.00
Japanese steamship America Maru	6,307	180	2,509.00	13.95

Mr. GALLINGER. Just to emphasize that point, Mr. President, it will be observed that the American ship has 157 men and the Japanese ship 180 men, and yet the Japanese ship pays in wages only about 40 per cent of the amount paid on the American ship. It is a very striking illustration of the handicap under which American ships on the Pacific Ocean have to operate.

Mr. PATTERSON. I believe the Senator from California has been reading from——

Mr. PERKINS. The paper to which the Senator from Colorado referred.

Mr. PATTERSON. He has read from the brief of the steamship company, prepared by the steamship company to induce the Congress to vote it this subsidy.

Mr. PERKINS. I so understood the Senator to refer to the paper. I sent for it. I am sorry to say I had not read it before and digested it, but I venture the assertion that it is correct in every respect, as I personally know the gentleman who wrote this paper and the company which operate and manage this steamship line.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not misrepresent the nature of the paper the Senator is reading from, do I? It is the brief or the argument prepared——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is.

Mr. PATTERSON. By the steamship company to induce the Congress to vote it this additional subsidy or compensation, or whatever you please to call it.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand this is the paper prepared by the company, and it is an abstract of their books.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator turn to the total cost of the manning of this steamship line a year?

Mr. PERKINS. The total cost of its management?

Mr. PATTERSON. Of its manning.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator is more familiar with this paper than I am.

Mr. PATTERSON. I never saw it except for about five minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. That is my case. I have it here. The actual loss per annum is $373,000.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is not what I am asking. What do the wages to the crew, including officers, cabin boys, stokers, engineers, sailors, etc., amount to?

Mr. PERKINS. It averages $41.65 per month per man, as against $13.95 for the Japanese ship.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator has told us that.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to emphasize it, my friend.

Mr. PATTERSON. I know. That has been told three or four times. Now, will the Senator answer the question: What is the total paid by this company to all its employees on this line?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator it is $78,480.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is a good deal more than that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not.

Mr. TELLER. It is more than that.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is over that. It is over $200,000. I want to do justice to the company. I believe it is about $250,000 per annum. Then I wanted the Senator to tell from that paper itself how much the United States pays the company for carrying the mails.

Mr. PERKINS. Instead of taking their figures and analyzing them particularly, I would rather go back to the original proposition, that these ships were built in the United States; that they were built by American mechanics; that the building cost represents 95 per cent of labor; that they cost 33 per cent more to build them with American labor, and 35 per cent more to operate them with American citizens or persons capable of becoming such than it costs to operate ships built in foreign countries by foreign mechanics and manned by Lascars and other men whom we do not wish to employ in this country.

There is one thing in this paper to which my friend refers which seems to me quite a significant point, and which I wish to advert to. These ships were built under the direction and according to plans prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy that they might be converted into cruisers in time of emergency if we required them for war purposes or as transports.

The United States converted the Buffalo, the Yankee, the Prairie, each of about 6,880 tons register, or an aggregate of 20,648 tons and 11,200 horsepower, of 14 knots speed, with armament of twenty-two guns, from 4 to 6 inch, and others of smaller caliber, and they cost the United States in 1904 over $1,041,000, including repairs, to maintain in commission. Against this, the Oceanic fleet—Sierra, Sonoma, and Ventura—were built under Government specifications for the purpose of speedy conversion into naval auxiliary cruisers. These three vessels, each about 6,100 tons register, aggregate 18,300 tons and 22,500 horsepower, and are of 17 knots speed, capable of an armament of not less than twelve 6-inch guns, with a large complement of smaller caliber, cost the Government only $196,402.84 net in 1904.

That is taken from this brief to which my friend refers and to which he called my attention, and, as I stated——

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Colorado asked the Senator from California what the wages of the officers and men amounted to in a year. It is $235,000, or a little over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and on that point I wish to make a statement.

Mr. PERKINS. Two hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; and over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was correct in saying that for one vessel it was $78,480. I thought the Senator from Colorado alluded to one vessel, and not to the entire line.

Mr. PERKINS. I am through. I merely wish to vouch for the patriotism and public spirit of those who own the Oceanic Steamship Company. The compensation for carrying the mails of the United States, to which the Senator refers, is very much less than that paid by other governments for carrying their mails in their own ships.

Mr. PATTERSON. I suppose the Senator from California will admit that the compensation paid for carrying the mails is very much more than would be received by the company for the same weight of freight if it was other than mails. Of course it is. So after all it is a subvention; it is a subsidy, under the name of compensation. It is a sum that was voted at the earnest solicitation of the Senators and Representatives representing the States on the ocean line for the purpose of equalizing in some degree the cost of running American and European ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, of course, is aware of the fact that the amount allowed by this body was reduced at least 25 per cent in another, and that the law as it was enacted provides much less than the Senate proposed to make it?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is not less than the steamship company contracted to carry the mails for.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is very true. They made the best bargain they could under the circumstances.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like——

Mr. GALLINGER. If I have the floor, I wish to make just one more statement, because the Senator from Colorado challenged my figures when I said the cost of wages per annum on one of these ships—that is, the Sonoma—was $78,480.

Mr. PATTERSON. Either I misunderstood the Senator or the Senator misunderstood me. I intended, and I thought I did ask, what was the total cost of the employees on this line, and the Senator, looking at some figures, said about $78,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. I said he was mistaken. I said it amounted to over $200,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is $78,480 for one steamship.

Mr. PATTERSON. My question was for the whole line.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then there is no controversy between the Senator from Colorado and me. The wages for the three steamships amount to over $240,000, or thereabout. Now I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to get some information from the Senator from California, if he will give me his attention.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from California for that purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. It is hardly possible for me to enlighten my friend the Senator from Nevada, but I will do the best I can.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am sure there is no one on the floor better informed regarding shipping than the Senator from California. I have very little knowledge on the subject.

I wish to ask him what would be the cost per ton of a steamship of 6,000 tons, sailing 12 knots an hour. It would not be as high as $150 per ton?

Mr. PERKINS. I can answer the question if the Senator will give me the size of the engine, the capacity of the boilers, the heating surface of the grates, and the furnaces. Without that it would be impossible for me to give an intelligible answer.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The statement has been made on the floor that the average cost of the shipping covered by this bill, outside of the fast vessels which would be intended as scouts, would be about $60 per ton. So I assumed that the Commission had some testimony before them as to the cost of these ships, varying, of course, according to the number of knots per hour they would sail; that if a ship sailing 10 knots an hour would cost an average of $60 per ton, the Senator would be able to tell us what a ship sailing 12 knots per hour would cost on the average.

Mr. PERKINS. There are various kinds of vessels built. There is the wooden vessel, which we all know about, and how she is constructed, with her knees and beams and sheathing, and all that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that.

Mr. PERKINS. Next to that we have the composite vessel, with iron frame and wooden sheathing. Next to that is perhaps the iron ship. Then there is the steel ship. Then there is the question whether she is constructed under the Bureau Veritas or under Lloyds', or what rule she is governed by.

The Senator might as well ask me how many gallons there are in a 2-quart measure. It would be impossible to answer without knowing the facts in the case. A gallon could not be contained in a 2-quart measure, but it is just as difficult for me to answer the one question as it would be to answer the other question.

Mr. FRYE. It is perfectly safe for the Senator to say that there is no ocean-going steamer built for $60 a ton.

Mr. PERKINS. It is from a hundred to a hundred and fifty dollars a ton.

Mr. FRYE. Some of them run to $200.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well; from a hundred to $200 a ton.

Mr. PERKINS. That gives us plenty of room for leeway—between a hundred and two hundred. It gives plenty of margin upon which to differ.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I will be a little more specific, and call his attention to a particular kind of ship.

I observe that the chairman of the Merchant Marine Commission addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, asking him to have the General Staff of the Army give "careful consideration to the question as to the extent and character of tonnage of merchant ships that would be required by the Army of the United States for the protection of insular possessions against an attack by a strong maritime power." The General Staff of the Army, replying to that, go into elaborate calculations as to the number of ships which would be required in such an emergency, and they come to the conclusion that they would require an aggregate gross measurement of 228 ships, with a total tonnage of 1,368,000 gross tons; and they recommend that each one of these ships should be capable of carrying from 5,500 to 6,500 tons.

So I now make the specific inquiry as to whether the Senator can inform us what transport ships of this character, carrying from 5,500 to 6,500 tons would cost per ton.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend the chairman of the Merchant Marine Commission has the data before him, and I will refer the question to him to answer, because I should be obliged to ask my friend the Senator from Nevada whether they were to be built in independent shipyards, whether they were to be built by the trust or combination, or whether he would join me in an independent shipbuilding yard to construct these ships for the Government at a profit of, say, 10 per cent to us.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then let me give the Senator a little information——

Mr. PERKINS. I shall be delighted to receive it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Inasmuch as he seems inclined to refer me to others.

Assuming that 1,368,000 gross tons would be required, divided up into 228 ships for the purpose of defending the Philippine Islands against the attack of a strong maritime power, in addition to the Navy we now have, at the rate of $100 per ton, the total cost of the additional merchant ships required would be $136,000,000. At a cost of $200 per ton, which is said to be the maximum, it would be two hundred and seventy-odd million dollars. I ask the Senator whether it is expected under this bill to promote a merchant marine of 228 ships of this tonnage, which the General Staff of the Army says would be absolutely required to defend the Philippine Islands against the attack of a strong maritime power?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not recently read with care the report from the War Department, but of course nothing of that kind is contemplated. I do not think that the General Staff in their report paid particular attention to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The insular possessions. I beg the Senator's pardon. It is simply for the defense of the insular possessions against the attack of a strong maritime power. They declare that in addition to our Navy, ships of that number and probable value would be required.

Mr. GALLINGER. This bill—the Senator knows it, I feel sure—is designed primarily for a different purpose from what he calls attention to. That we need ships which can be impressed into the service of the Government in time of extreme emergency goes without saying. The Navy Department has recognized it in a communication to the Merchant Marine Commission, as has the War Department. But that the War Department recommends or even suggests that we ought now to spend two or three hundred million dollars for ships for that purpose can not possibly be correct. If we get a small proportion of the number the Senator has alluded to, we shall then have some reserve ships that the Government can employ, just as it had to purchase foreign ships during the late war with Spain; and to that extent the Government will derive a benefit and the country will have a means of defense against foreign powers.

As to the cost of the ships, it depends entirely upon their construction. The Senator might as well ask how much it would cost to build a house 100 feet square. It would not cost much to build one for me, but it would cost a good deal to build one of that size for the Senator from Nevada. And so with a ship. But I can give the Senator reasonably correct information concerning two types of ships.

We will take the steamships being built by the Ward Line for the Cuban trade—magnificent floating palaces, in a way, not any better than they ought to be or than the American people demand. They cost about a hundred and fifty dollars per gross ton. They are 6,000-ton ships, and the cost is nine hundred or ten hundred thousand dollars. We will take a tramp steamship, such as the Pleiades, for instance, that plies on the Pacific Ocean. Its cost was about $75 a ton. She is a 12-knot steamship, and of course of a different type from the Ward Line steamships, and much slower.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does it belong to the so-called "tramp" class of steamers?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is an American steamship, running between New York——

Mr. PERKINS. Through the Strait of Magellan.

Mr. GALLINGER. Through the Strait of Magellan to Hawaii. It cost about $75 a ton, and I think I have accurate information on that point. But, of course, it is impossible offhand, with any degree of accuracy, to say how much a steamship of a given tonnage will cost. It depends altogether upon circumstances, and the cost has to be figured out and determined with a great deal of care.

Mr. PATTERSON rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Colorado desire to interrupt me?

Mr. PATTERSON. I thought the Senator was about to sit down, and I wish to say something.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just a word more, and I will be through. I wish to put in the RECORD, and I will ask permission to do so, a table showing the speed, the number of voyages, the subsidy per voyage, and the total subsidies received by seven great steamship lines on the Pacific coast, one French line, one German line, three British lines, one Japanese line, and one American line; and when this is in print I will commend it to the careful consideration of Senators who want correct information on those points.

I will say that the Merchant Marine Commission has been reasonably industrious. It has not taken the briefs of attorneys as its authority, but it has in a great many instances verified the figures which have been given it, and it has verified this table, and believes it to be correct.

The table is as follows:

Speed, number of voyages, and subsidies received by seven steamship lines on Pacific coast.

Name.	Nationality.	Average speed on voyage.	Number voyages annually.	Subsidy per voyage.	Total subsidy received.
Messageries Maritimes	French	14	13	$47,814	$621,587
North German Lloyd	German	13.5	12	41,604	499,245
Peninsular and Oriental	British	13	26	16,346	425,000
Orient	do	14	26	23,077	600,000
Nippon Yusen Kaisha	Japanese		12	21,917	263,000
Canadian-Australian	British	14	12	27,500	330,000
Oceanic Steamship Co	American	15	17	16,659	282,203

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few days ago I intended to put in the RECORD a comparison between two tramp steamships, one a Norwegian and the other an American, showing the difference in wages paid the ships, as well as the difference in the cost of construction and the difference in the cost of food. It is the American steamship Pleiades and the Norwegian steamship Olaff Kyrie, they being of the same tonnage, having the same number of crew, the American costing $61,000 more than the Norwegian. The statement is very illuminating, and I desire simply to place it in the RECORD that Senators may refer to it at their convenience.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Comparison of American and Norwegian steam "tramps"—Wages paid.

	American steamship Pleiades.		Norwegian steamship Olaff Kyrie.
	Number.	Wages.	Number.	Wages.
Master	1	$200	1	$110
First mate	1	70	1	35
Second mate	1	85	1	27
Third mate			1	22
Carpenter			1	25
Boatswain			1	25
Steward	1	55	1	37
Cook	1	40	1	27
Messroom boy	1	20	1	8
Lamp trimmer	1	20
Able seamen	8	240	6	120
First engineer	1	100	1	65
Second engineer	1	65	1	38
Third engineer	1	50	1	25
Donkeyman			1	20
Firemen	6	240	6	120
Oilers	2	80
Boy			1	8
Month	26	1,215	26	712
Year		14,580		8,544

The annual difference is thus $6,036.

The Pleiades is a steel American-built cargo steamer now in the Pacific trade. This comparison is made with white crews on both ships in the Atlantic Ocean.

Charges based on cost of construction.

	American.	Norwegian.
First cost	$275,000	$214,000
Interest, 5 per cent	13,750	10,700
Depreciation, 5 per cent	13,750	10,700
Insurance, 6 per cent	16,500	12,840

COMPARISON OF COST OF FOOD.

American crew: 26 men, at $0.50 a day, for 365 days	$4,745
Norwegian crew: 26 men, at $0.30 a day, for 365 days	2,847
The annual difference is thus	1,898

Adding together the difference in annual wages, the difference in charges based on cost of construction, and the difference in the cost of food, there is a total of $17,649, as between an American steamer, like the Pleiades, of the "tramp" type, and a similar Norwegian steamer.

The Pleiades, of 3,753 gross tons, would receive in subventions annually, on the basis of $5 per gross ton, the sum of $18,765—thus amply equalizing conditions between this typical American freighter and a Norwegian freighter of like class.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not care to say anything further at the present time.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I think the question I asked the other day started this particular line of controversy. I called attention to the additional compensation that was provided in this bill for an Atlantic line of steamers and a Pacific line of steamers. My recollection is that the Senator from New Hampshire at that time was equally clear as to the necessity for additional compensation to both these lines of steamers. He had reason to believe or fear that if this additional compensation was not given to the Atlantic line it would haul down the American flag and go under a European flag, as he thought that if the Pacific line did not receive the additional compensation it also would haul down the flag.

The part of the bill which provided for the additional compensation to the Atlantic line has been voluntarily stricken out by the Senator from New Hampshire. That would indicate either that the Senator has received new light about that line since we commenced the controversy or else that it was put into the bill inadvertently and without due thought and due reflection. I do not know which it was. It would indicate, however, Mr. President, that when it comes to paying money out of the Treasury for ship lines those representing the shipping interests are not quite as particular as they would be if American money was asked for something else.

I am glad the Senator from New Hampshire has seen the light. and discovered that he was either in error originally in consenting to this additional quarter of a million per annum for the Atlantic ships, or that he has received new information which convinces him that he was in error, and, therefore, that we may keep the flag flying on the Atlantic line, it is not necessary to put our hands into the Treasury of the United States and pay to the company a quarter of a million dollars additional every year.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have a single observation to make in reply to the Senator from Colorado. We sometimes do have insufficient information when we undertake to legislate. A wise man changes his mind. A certain class of men never do.

I have more information concerning the American Line than I had when I was somewhat instrumental in putting that provision in the bill. One item of information I have is that the line is presided over by a British subject. While the four ships are flying the American flag a foreigner is at the head of the line.

Mr. PATTERSON. In other words, the Senator does not propose to allow a Britisher to carry the American flag.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not exactly that, but there are other considerations as well in that connection which I will not stop to relate. I believe that that line, as I said before, will of necessity go under a foreign flag before a great many years unless some relief is secured. But there is a great problem on the Atlantic Ocean, different from that on the Pacific Ocean. This is the only American line on the North Atlantic, and it is contending against tremendously powerful influences in Great Britain that if met at all must be met more adequately than the provision in the bill called for.

I was persuaded, after looking the matter all over, that the case was not by any means as strong as the Pacific case, and inasmuch as there was objection raised, not only here, but elsewhere, to that provision I was willing to strike it out. I was impressed to a very considerable extent in reaching that conclusion by the attitude which the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] took, that while he was against that provision he favored the additional compensation to the Oceanic Line. While I would gladly vote for the amount that was placed in the bill for the line on the Atlantic Ocean, yet there are circumstances, one of which I have named to the Senator, which is not the controlling one by any means, which led me to think it might go out of the bill, and on my motion it went out.

I do not think I was inconsistent about it. I acted for what I thought was the best interest of the American people and with no particular thought of facilitating the passage of this bill. I expect that all sorts of objections will be raised to every provision that is in the bill before we come to a vote, because Senators who are going to vote against the bill and have made up their minds in advance to vote against the bill are going to find all sorts of things in the bill that ought to be different.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know that I have made a very lucid explanation of my position on this matter, but I am entirely satisfied that what I did the other day in moving to strike out that provision was wise action, and I stand by it now.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think, Mr. President, it was undoubtedly wise, and if the Senator would extend his wisdom to striking out the other provision I think it would be equally wise.

Mr. GALLINGER. That might be so, but there is one other point in connection with that matter. We have had no evidence that the Atlantic line was losing as much money as the Pacific line manifestly is. That it is losing money I have no doubt, but not to so great an extent. However, the Senator can move to strike it out.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; I intend to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no inhibition so far as that side of the Chamber is concerned in considering the bill or in moving to amend it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I intend to do it, if no one else does.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator does it, his wisdom will be displayed in one direction and mine in another, because I shall vote against the motion, and we will have to take our chances as to the relative wisdom that has been displayed by the Senator and myself.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the principal objection to this item is the bald and glaring form of largess, or gift or donation, to a company that is already in contractual relations with the Government for carrying the mail and receiving a very large subsidy for carrying the mail.

That was satisfactory to the company for, I think, ten years, and it was so well satisfied that the contract was renewed at its own solicitation. If there is to be this tender solicitude for the prosperity and welfare of those who are in contractual relations with the Government, there is absolutely no limit to the benefits the solicitude will find scope for action in. The Government is in contract with hundreds, if not thousands. The Government has contracts with individuals and companies for the erection of great public buildings. The Government has contracts with hundreds or thousands for the carrying of the mail inland, and I refer now particularly to the star-route system of mail carrying.

I have not any question, Mr. President, but that every year mail contractors discover that they have made improvident contracts with the Government—contracts sufficient at the time they were made, but ofttimes a sudden increase in population, and therefore an increase in mail demands, have grown positively injurious to carrying on the contracts for the carrying of the mail, and they find that so far as the mail is concerned they are losing money. But they are under heavy bonds as a rule. The men who contract with the Government for star-route mail service are honorable men, and they carry out their contracts with the Government even though it be at a great loss.

I have an instance in mind, of the construction of the mint building in Denver, where the contractor lost a great deal of money. Yet his bondsmen made good the loss. We did not think of coming to Congress for the purpose of asking an appropriation to indemnify either the contractor or the bondsmen. Neither do those who lose money in their dealings with the Government in other lines of business. But it is because they attempt to involve the American flag floating over water instead of land in contracts. It is thought that this ought to be done for those who entered into business of this kind—who voluntarily built their ships—and they did not build them and put them in these lines from patriotic motives, either. They counted the cost. They scanned the markets. They informed themselves as to the degree and the kind of business that would come to their enterprise. Having done that, simply as a money-making proposition they constructed these ships, and they entered into the business and made contracts with the Government for the carrying of the mail. Then when they lose money according to their own showing they say: "Why, we are sailing on the water. The American flag is absent from Asiatic ports. The English flag and the flag of Holland are more frequently seen in foreign ports than the American flag." Therefore Congress should put its hands into the Treasury of the United States and should reimburse these business men for losses in ventures upon which they voluntarily entered, presumably after having counted the cost.

Mr. President, I can not understand this retrogression. Some of these lines were started years and years ago. Take the Pacific line. The business then, as compared with the business now, was small. The travel from the United States to the Asiatic ports and the Australasian ports was very, very small. Since then thousands of Americans have gone to those countries—to China, to Japan, to the Philippines, and to other islands of the Pacific—and the business of shipping freight has grown relatively to tremendous proportions. The travel of individuals has increased in an extraordinary degree. The amount of business now between the Pacific coast and the countries of the west is vastly in excess of what it was when these ships were put upon the ocean and these contracts were entered into between the ship companies and the Government.

But, Mr. President, there is a subsidy microbe in the atmosphere. All along the Atlantic coast and all along the Pacific coast these microbes have bored their way into the brains and into the ears and into the cuticles of the members of these ship companies. They find Senators and Representatives clamoring for subsidy, and the microbe has worked its will upon them, and they join the huge procession of subvention applicants and do not want to be omitted. I do not blame them.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. That microbe did get into my brain when I voted for the irrigation project. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, Mr. President, that was for the purpose of benefiting the public lands of the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and steamships are for the purpose of benefiting the commerce of the country.

Mr. PATTERSON. The public lands are still in the possession of the United States and the United States still has title to them.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the money is in the hands of the people of the States.

Mr. PATTERSON. The money is yet in the pockets of the people of the States, and as the Government will make the lands valuable the people of the Western States will pay the enhanced price for the lands; and they ask no odds of the Government.

Mr. TELLER. And pay back the money.

Mr. PATTERSON. And pay back the money.

Mr. GALLINGER. They have not paid it back yet.

Mr. PATTERSON. They have not had an opportunity.

Mr. GALLINGER. We expect to pay this back by developing the commerce of the country. We expect to pay back tenfold if we get a merchant marine.

Mr. PATTERSON. The law for the reclamation of the arid lands requires that the money shall be paid back practically in advance. It is a lien upon the land, and the title does not pass until every dollar of the purchase price is paid. The purchaser simply takes the land at its enhanced value by reason of the water having been put upon it by the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if the Government of the United States did not come to the rescue of the arid and semiarid regions of this country and practically advance the money to enable them to work out their prosperity?

Mr. PATTERSON. The Government, Mr. President, in a lucid moment came to its own relief. The Government found millions and millions of acres of worthless lands upon its hands. The business of the land office had fallen off until an arrangement had been made or laws proposed by which the land officers were to be discharged. It was only here and there within an Indian reservation that the men who go to the West could find lands that were worth taking up. It was because the men of the West knew the situation, and knowing the situation appealed in a law for the benefit of the Government that would enable the Government to sell the lands to settlers without losing a dollar.

It was under those circumstances, Mr. President, that the law for the reclamation of arid lands was passed—no bounty, no subsidy, no gift—the men of the West paying to the Government the full value of that which they received from the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is of necessity laboring considerably to make a good cause out of a bad one. This great country of ours——

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, I do not want to yield for a speech.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is appealing to the country——

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not want to yield to a speech. I have something else I want to say.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yielded a little of my time to the Senator and he talked for half an hour.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, no; we do not recollect it the same way.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator talked so long that I forgot that I had yielded, and I did not call time on the Senator. However, if the Senator does not care to have me interrupt him, I will speak in my own time.

Mr. PATTERSON. There will be ample time. If it is to make a speech, I do not want to yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was not to make a speech. It was to make an illustration, but it will keep.

Mr. PATTERSON. Illustrations, if they are sound ones, will always keep. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is much sounder than the Senator's argument.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, if those who have made unfortunate business ventures, whether in inaugurating ship lines or in taking star-route mail contracts, or in the erection of public buildings, will be permitted to make out their own brief and come to Congress to seek reparation for their losses, and you will take their word for it, they are worthy objects of charity, and the money of the Government would be poured out in a constant stream to alleviate their misfortunes.

Mr. President, I want to refer again to the coastwise laws. The first real substantial act that smacked of justice to the West, barring the land laws themselves, by which lands were sold to the settler at a reasonable price, was the reclamation act. As I said before, there is not an atom of bounty, or gift, or subsidy of any kind in the law. The money received from the public lands is used for the purpose of increasing the value of the remaining lands, and when their value has been increased by putting water upon them then the settler, if he desires to purchase, will pay the price the Government demands, and that is the beginning and the ending of it.

But how is it with our shipping friends? The Government of the United States has been more generous to them since we have had a Government than to any other class of business people in the world. The coastwise laws constitute a huge subsidy. It is not that I complain about them, but we know by reason of the limitations and restrictions contained in the coastwise laws that those engaged in business upon both coasts are paying two or three or four times as much for every ton that is transported from American port to American port than they would pay were the coastwise laws not in existence; and in the end the consumer, the rich and the poor and the middle class, pay practically the entire freight. So our friends from New England and the Pacific coast should not talk about the lack of generosity on the part of Congress if it declines to yield upon every occasion to their demands, and more particularly when their demands have now assumed a form that would be acknowledged to be objectionable in every other class of business except this business.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PATTERSON. With great pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator know of any country which permits its coastwise trade to be carried in foreign ships?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am not familiar, Mr. President, with the coastwise trade, and I am not familiar with the shipping laws generally. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether they have similar laws in all countries regarding the coastwise trade?

Mr. LODGE. I think it is universal that the coastwise trade in all countries is reserved to ships of the registry of that country.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am glad that that is the Senator's thought. He thinks that that is universal?

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt of it. If the Senator wants me to assert it, I will say that I know it is so.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is much more definite.

Mr. LODGE. That is the universal rule.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that Great Britain, for instance, by law restricts the carriage of freight and passengers between the mother country and the colonies to British ships?

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not say that.

Mr. BACON. Is not that what is generally understood by "coastwise trade?"

Mr. LODGE. That is not the impression I have of what constitutes coastwise trade.

Mr. BACON. The Senator means by "coastwise trade" trade around the islands of Great Britain.

Mr. LODGE. I mean exactly what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] has been talking about—from one American port to another American port, or from one British port to another British port. The latter trade is carried on in British vessels. I was not talking about the colonies.

Mr. BACON. I will restrict it, then, to the British islands.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I am asking only for information. I have no doubt that practically it is true that all the commerce between different ports of the British islands is carried in British ships, because in the absence of any law the British could underbid the ships of any other country; but is there a law of Great Britain which prohibits foreign ships from carrying freight from one British port to another British port?

Mr. PATTERSON. Say from London to Liverpool.

Mr. LODGE. I have always understood—for instance, from Leeds to London, or from London to Liverpool, or from Liverpool to Southampton—that all traffic of that kind is confined to British bottoms.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt that is so.

Mr. LODGE. I mean by law.

Mr. BACON. That is a very interesting fact in the consideration of this question, but this is the first time I have been informed of it.

Mr. PATTERSON. This discussion will give time and allow the Senator from Massachusetts an opportunity to verify his very strong impression. But, Mr. President, that does not alter my proposition. Because Great Britain, France, Germany, and Holland are doing a certain thing is no reason why we must do it, and is no evidence that it is right. It does not change the proposition that by reason of the coastwise law the cost of everything that enters into the economic, the domestic, and the social life of the country is largely increased, and the shipping interests of the Atlantic and Pacific get the benefit of it. I do not envy them; I do not object to it; I am not finding fault with it. I am glad that the people of the country, the people of the West uniting with the people of other sections of the country, have been broad enough and generous enough and large-hearted enough to vote millions of dollars out of their pockets every year for the benefit of the shipping interests of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the Great Lakes. The only reason I had for adverting to it was that we are in a sense charged with being ungenerous and unmindful of the shipping interests because we do not turn around now and vote to make bad contracts good and vote a direct subsidy to ships not yet in existence, and select particular objects of the country's charity or bounty—I care not which—and take the money of the people out of the Treasury to enable the shipowners to do a profitable business. I know the answer that is made. It is "the American flag; we want American goods carried in American bottoms; and in case of war we shall have seamen and we shall have ships." That is the argument. It is simply necessary to make a patriotic appeal to support any attempt at subsidy. I do not care what direction it may take, you can make a patriotic appeal, and you can show in some way or another that it would be a wise and patriotic thing to alleviate the want of prosperity or the citizen from the result of bad bargains just as much as is the case when you make appeals in behalf of the shipowners of the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts.

Mr. President, I still reiterate that this item to which our attention is now directed is absolutely indefensible on any principle or rule of commercial integrity or commercial honor.

The men who are to be the beneficiaries are upon the wrong side of the transaction. I do not want to pursue the discussion along this line.

I had hoped the Senator from New Hampshire would have voluntarily agreed to strike out that objectionable feature, and thus make the measure much less objectionable to a number of Senators, as I know it would be from the remarks I have heard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Senator vote for the bill if that should be stricken out?

Mr. PATTERSON. No; I would not vote for any form of gift or subsidy or subvention to anybody or anything.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I should think the Senator would want the bill as objectionable as possible.

Mr. PATTERSON. No; that is not my idea of the duty of a legislator. If he finds a bill likely to pass the body of which he is a member, his duty is to make it as little objectionable as possible, so as to do as little harm as possible and set as few bad precedents as possible; but I suppose the bill will pass.

Mr. GALLINGER. I meant "as bad as possible" from the Senator's point of view. I did not mean it in the broad sense.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, well, I am satisfied that if the Senator from New Hampshire and I could have a few moments of private conversation he would agree that my view of this thing was right—I mean of this particular gift. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. Then it might be a good idea to adjourn over until Monday, in order to give the Senators an opportunity to have that conversation.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] made an inquiry as to the cost of ships. The St. Louis and the St. Paul, together, cost $5,100,000; that is $220 a ton. The Pacific Mail Line built two 18-knot ships at Newport News which cost $160 a ton. For the construction of the Mascanoma, of 4,200 tons, a very low-powered ship, practically a freight ship, the lowest bid was $80 a ton.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of how many knots?

Mr. FRYE. I do not know, but probably that ship will not run over 7 or 8 knots. It is a freight ship. There is no use of making a freight ship of over 10 knots.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is it of iron construction?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; of iron construction. So that taking it from 16 knots up the cost of a freight and passenger ship would average $160 a ton, and one from, say, 8 knots to 10 knots would probably average from $80 to $100 a ton, having regard to the difference of finish and all that sort of thing if she happens to carry passengers.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator whether it is expected that this bill will in the main promote the construction of the low-priced tonnage or of the higher-priced tonnage?

Mr. FRYE. My recollection about the bill is that it runs from 10 to 14 knots. That is my impression. I think the cost would probably run from $90 to $120 or $125 a ton.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to make a few suggestions on this bill, but I understand Senators wish an executive session. I should like to take the floor on Monday for the purpose of making some remarks, but, though I shall only occupy a short time, I do not care about proceeding now.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the point which has been raised I will say that the speed varies from 12 to 16 knots.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator want to go on further with the bill now?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no desire to detain the Senate, but I want to put in the RECORD a little information which I have taken the pains to acquire since this debate opened to-day—it will take but a moment—in reference to the cost of steamships, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] being particularly interested in that point.

An ordinary steam "tramp" of 10 or 11 knots, built for cargo exclusively, can be constructed in the United States under favorable conditions for about $60 a ton.

A steamship of 5,000 to 6,000 tons, capable of a sustained sea speed of 12 knots—that is, of a record speed of 13 or 14 knots—fitted for freight and not a large number of passengers, and adapted in a general way for transport service, would cost on an average close to $100 a ton.

A passenger and freight steamship of 5,000 tons and upward, and of 16 knots or 17, would cost about $150 a ton.

A mail and passenger steamship, with small capacity for freight and a speed of 20 knots an hour, would cost close to $200 a ton, due in part to the luxurious fittings required by such a high-class passenger vessel.

Mr. President, I had intended to make some observations in reply to my good-natured and always entertaining friend from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] on the irrigation matter——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor, but I will, of course, yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not wish to proceed now, and I will forego what I have to say until some other time when I can get the opportunity.

I believed when I voted for the irrigation bill—and I had some knowledge of it—that I was voting for about as pure a subsidy, and perhaps as meritorious a subsidy, as was ever voted for in this body. I have just been reading the bill, and I confess I can not change my mind on that point.

Mr. TELLER. We will thrash that out later.

Mr. GALLINGER. As the Senator from Colorado suggests, we will thrash that out later.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as I have stated, I understand that some Senators desire an executive session. If so, I will yield to such a motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. TELLER. I will submit that motion.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a moment that I may give a notice.

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia for that purpose.

PARTICIPATION IN EUROPEAN INTERNATIONAL QUESTIONS.

Mr. BACON. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall ask the courtesy of the Senate that I may submit some remarks in reference to Senate resolution No. 52, which was introduced by me a few days ago, with reference to our interference with or participation in any controversy between European governments relative to European international questions.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF STATE OF MISSOURI.

Mr. ALDRICH. On yesterday I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 567) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of certain claims of the State of Missouri was passed. I should like to have the bill reconsidered for the purpose of offering an amendment, which I think will be satisfactory to the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. WARNER. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. And to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to reconsider the vote by which the bill named by him was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is now before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the bill the proviso which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to either create or acknowledge any obligation on the part of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, for what does the bill provide?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to report upon certain claims of the State of Missouri against the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Originating on what account?

Mr. WARNER. It is a war claim.

Mr. SPOONER. A war claim?

Mr. WARNER. Yes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TELLER. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 5, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 2, 1906.

CONSULS.

George M. Hotschick, of Wisconsin, to be consul of the United States at Trieste, Austria.

Maxwell Blake, of Missouri, to be consul of the United States at Funchal, Madeira.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Francis L. Lee, of Texas, to be collector of customs for the district of Galveston, in the State of Texas.

REAPPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Judge-Advocate-General's Department.

Brig. Gen. George B. Davis, Judge-Advocate-General, to be Judge-Advocate-General with the rank of brigadier-general for the period of four years beginning May 23, 1905, with rank from May 24, 1901, his former appointment as Judge-Advocate-General having expired May 23, 1905.

Ordnance Department.

Lieut. Jay H. Sypher to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy from the 22d day of January, 1906.

POSTMASTERS.

GEORGIA.

Samuel E. Dailey to be postmaster at McDonough, in the county of Henry and State of Georgia.

Emma B. Dyar to be postmaster at Calhoun, in the county of Gordon and State of Georgia.

James F. Overstreet to be postmaster at Douglas, in the county of Coffee and State of Georgia.

James M. Sutton to be postmaster at Adel, in the county of Berrien and State of Georgia.

Lucy L. Weldon to be postmaster at Lavonia, in the county of Franklin and State of Georgia.

PENNSYLVANIA.

George C. Burns to be postmaster at Montrose, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Samuel M. Turk to be postmaster at Parkers Landing, in the county of Armstrong and State of Pennsylvania.

VERMONT.

E. H. Webster to be postmaster at Barton, in the county of Orleans and State of Vermont.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 2, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXTENDING THE PUBLIC-LAND LAWS TO CERTAIN LANDS IN WYOMING.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8107) extending the public-land laws to certain lands in Wyoming.

Be it enacted, etc., That the public-land laws of the United States be, and the same are hereby, extended to the lands embraced within the territory 10 miles square ceded to the United States by the Shoshone and Arapaho Indians by the agreement ratified by the act approved June 7, 1897.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, is this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes, sir. I can explain the provisions of the bill very briefly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I do not care about that. If all the members of the committee were for the bill, I take for granted they ought to know their business.

Mr. MONDELL. It was also recommended by the Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12987.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. VREELAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad-rate bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] such time as he may desire, provided he does not exceed forty minutes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this bill is entitled "An act to amend 'An act to regulate commerce,'" approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The title indicates the purpose and intent of this measure. The original act of 1887 creating the Interstate Commerce Commission, when passed, was supposed to give full power to the Commission, not only to declare what railroad rates were unreasonable, when challenged, but in addition thereto, to fix just and reasonable rates and enforce them. For a number of years this power was undoubted and undisputed. Then, in litigation over the act of 1887, it was determined by the Supreme Court of the United States that while the Commission had power to declare what were unreasonable rates, they did not have the power, on complaint of shippers, to fix rates, and were shorn of the power to enforce them. As the law now stands the Commission simply possess the power to denounce a particular rate as unreasonable. One of the most important sections, therefore, of this bill is section 4, which confers the power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged.

The orders of the Commission may be enforced by extraordinary writs of mandamus and injunction and by fine.

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL.

A further analysis of this bill, Mr. Chairman, is about as follows. Material parts of section 4 are as follows:

That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged; and what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed; and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation, to the extent to which the Commission find the same to exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed, and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed.

Section 1 is substantially section 1 of the act of 1887, with an enlargement of the definition of the word "railroad" and the word "transportation." By this enlargement it is believed that the "devices" resorted to by carriers, through the use of switches, terminal tracks, and private cars, and so forth, can be obviated.

Under section 2 more prompt obedience to the law on the part of the carriers relating to tariff schedules is to be secured, and there is also a requirement that icing and other charges be stated in their schedules. Thirty days' notice of the changing of schedules is required, so as to do away with discriminations heretofore made through what are called "midnight tariffs."

Section 3 relieves the Commission of reporting a finding of facts whenever an investigation is made. A finding of conclusions is deemed sufficient.

Section 4, after defining the powers of the Commission, provides that its orders shall go into effect in thirty days and remain in force (unless suspended, modified, or set aside by the Commission, or "by a court of competent jurisdiction") for a term of three years.

Section 5 is intended to aid complainants in whose behalf damages are awarded on complaint by the Commission. It imposes on the carrier the duty to comply with an order of the Commission as long as it is in effect. It provides a penalty of $5,000 for disobedience, the forfeiture to be paid to the United States, to be recovered by the Attorney-General. This section also provides for the enforcement of the order of the Commission, other than for the payment of money, by the Commission or any party injured applying to the circuit court in the district where the carrier has its principal office or in which the violation shall happen. Appeals lie to the Supreme Court of the United States, and such cases are to have priority in hearing and determination over all other causes except criminal causes, but such appeal shall not vacate or suspend the order appealed from. Section 6 provides for rehearings before the Commission.

Section 7 gives the Commission power to require reports from all common carriers. The other provisions of the bill, Mr. Chairman, are mere matters of detail, such as the prescribing of forms, the salaries of the Commission, provisions for the attendance of witnesses, etc. Possibly the bill may need amendments, but it seems to be the best that can be framed under all the circumstances. Former Senator Cockrell, of Missouri, now on the Commission, told me in conversation that it was thought best to take the existing law as the basis, amend it and remedy its defects as it had been construed by the courts, and it was safer to amend the present law.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion (and I am well aware that even those of the longest service and the ripest experience are unable to fathom some of the great questions presented for the consideration of this body), important as are other questions before Congress and the American people—the Philippine question, those involved in the control and final disposition of our island possessions; the tariff; the admission of new States—this question perhaps comes nearer home to the interest and welfare of every American citizen than any question presented for action by the Representatives of the people in Congress assembled.

This question has agitated the public mind for many years past. I remember when I entered Congress six years ago I went with a distinguished North Carolinian, now one of the ablest judges upon the bench of my State, to see the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to the possibility of the enactment of legislation like this now proposed. The impression we then received was that it was almost hopeless; but the agitation has been continued; the drift has been irresistibly in the direction of this legislation. For the past year public sentiment has so crystallized that we find this bill presented by the unanimous vote of the proper committee—the Interstate Commerce Committee—for definite action and enactment into the law of the land. Both Republicans and Democrats agree in a unanimous report upon this bill, and I suppose it will pass this House with but few dissenting votes. It has been said that the measure is nonpartisan, and was so stated by eminent gentlemen upon the Republican side of the Chamber. While I am willing to concur in this view of this legislation, it is logical and appropriate to state in this place and in the very beginning of my remarks the attitude of the Democratic party upon this question.

THE DEMOCRATIC POSITION UPON THE REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES AND THE ENLARGEMENT OF THE POWERS OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The national Democratic platform in 1896 contained the following:

The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and the formation of trusts and pools require a stricter control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such restrictions and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

The national Democratic platform in 1900 presented the question in the following language:

We favor such an enlargement of the scope of the interstate-commerce law as will enable the Commission to protect individuals and communities from discriminations and the public from unjust and unfair transportation rates.

The national Democratic platform of 1904 declared:

Individual equality of opportunity and free competition are essential to a healthy and permanent commercial prosperity, and any trust, combination, or monopoly tending to destroy these by controlling production, restricting competition, or fixing prices should be prohibited and punished by law. We especially denounce rebates and discrimination by transportation companies as the most potent agency in promoting and strengthening these unlawful conspiracies against trade.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

We demand an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief from the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation.

These platforms of the Democratic party show that the Democratic position, as stated in its platforms for the past ten years, has been unqualifiedly for the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and regulation of railroad rates.

THE PRESIDENT'S POSITION UPON THE REGULATION OF RAILWAY RATES AND ENLARGEMENT OF THE POWERS OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what is the position of the President of the United States. Why, that is in line with the Democratic position. In his last message, communicated to both Houses of Congress at the beginning of the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, the President said:

(I read from that message, and I will add the President has been unwavering in support of this policy.)

As I said in my message of December 6 last, the immediate and most pressing need, so far as legislation is concerned, is the enactment into law of some scheme to secure to the agents of the Government such supervision and regulation of the rates charged by the railroads of the country engaged in interstate traffic as shall summarily and effectively prevent the imposition of unjust or unreasonable rates. It must include putting a complete stop to rebates in every shape and form. This power to regulate rates, like all similar powers over the business world, should be exercised with moderation, caution, and self-restraint, but it should exist so that it can be effectively exercised when the need arises.

In my judgment the most important provision which such law should contain is that conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a given rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and if it is found to be unreasonable and unjust, then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the maximum reasonable rate, as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts.

Then the President, in speaking of a matter which particularly concerns the interests of my people, says:

All private car lines, industrial roads, refrigerator charges, and the like should be expressly put under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission or some similar body, so far as rates and agreements practically affecting rates are concerned. The private car owners and the owners of industrial railroads are entitled to a fair and reasonable compenstion on their investment, but neither private cars nor industrial railroads nor spur tracks should be utilized as devices for securing preferential rates. A rebate in icing charges or in mileage or in a division of the rate for refrigerating charges is just as pernicious as a rebate in any other way.

The President further says:

There should be publicity of the accounts of common carriers; no common carrier engaged in interstate business should keep any books or memoranda other than those reported pursuant to law or regulation, and these books or memoranda should be open to the inspection of the Government.

The question of transportation lies at the root of all industrial success, and the revolution in transportation which has taken place during the last half century has been the most important factor in the growth of the new industrial conditions. Most emphatically we do not wish to see the man of great talents refused the reward for his talents. Still less do we wish to see him penalized; but we do desire to see the system of railroad transportation so handled that the strong man shall be given no advantage over the weak man. We wish to insure as fair treatment for the small town as for the big city; for the small shipper as for the big shipper. In the old days the highway of commerce, whether by water or by a road on land, was open to all; it belonged to the public and the traffic along it was free. At present the railway is this highway, and we must do our best to see that it is kept open to all on equal terms.

I urge upon the Congress the need of providing for expeditious action by the Commission in all these matters, whether in the regulating of rates for transportation or for storing or handling property or commodities in transit. The history of the cases litigated under the present commerce act shows that its efficacy has been destroyed by the weapon of delay, almost the most formidable weapon in the hands of those whose purpose it is to violate the law.

WHETHER DEMOCRATIC OR REPUBLICAN THE BILL IS RIGHT IN PRINCIPLE.

But regardless of the attitude of the Democratic party, or the Republican party, or the President of the United States on this question, it is right in principle, and the enactment of this measure, or some measure which will give the shippers of the country relief, is just and necessary.

It does not in any way infringe the rights of the railway corporations; there is no question that it is in the interest of shippers and the people. Why, Mr. Chairman, the principle of the regulation of railway rates in a just, fair, and reasonable manner, the fact that railroad corporations and other corporations are amenable to State and national control, that they are public servants deriving their right to exist from State and Federal laws, is beyond question and controversy. [Applause.]

The great and eminent scholar and jurist, the Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, of Pennsylvania, stated this principle so fully and so clearly that it is beyond cavil and dispute. Of Jeremiah S. Black, Judge Brewer, in his World's Greatest Orations, says that Judge Black served upon the bench of the supreme court of Pennsylvania and in the Cabinet of President Buchanan, and was noted for his great opinions as well as his official prominence. As a man and as a lawyer he showed an individuality so marked, and in certain ways so representative, that men of all parties listened to him with attention they seldom gave the official utterances of any public man.

When, says Judge Brewer, in 1883 he went before the judiciary committee of the Pennsylvania senate and delivered an address on the State's power of eminent domain and on the duties of corporations as public servants, the effect was felt throughout the country. It is doubtful if any other speech on a technical question of law and industrial economy ever produced effect so profound and so far-reaching. It is believed that the forces set in motion by sympathy with Judge Black's views thus expressed decided more than one Presidential election, and did more than anything else to make possible the radical changes which took place in the politics of the Northwestern States between 1883 and 1892.

In this speech before the Pennsylvania senate Judge Black, in a clear, forcible, and eloquent way, showed the relations and obligations of corporations to the State and to the people. More than twenty years ago these are some of the things that he said, which in this latter day have been verified:

The irrepressible conflict between the rights of the people and the interests of railroad corporations does not seem likely to terminate immediately.

But in all these cases the proprietary right remained in the State and was held by her in trust for the use of the people. Those who run the railroads and canals are always public agents. It is impossible to look at them in any other light or to conceive how a different relation could exist, because a railroad which is not managed by public agents can not be a public highway.

But, on the other hand, the corporations deny that they owe any responsibility to the State more than individuals engaged in private business. They assert that the management of the railroads, being a mere speculation of their own, these thoroughfares of trade and travel must be run for their interests, without regard to public right. If they take advantage of their power to oppress the labor and overtax the land of the State; if they crush the industry of one man or place to build up the prosperity of another; if they plunder the rich by extortion or deepen the distress of the poor by discriminating against them, they justify themselves by showing that all this was in the way of business; that their interest required them to do it; that if they had done otherwise their fortunes would not have been so great as they are; that it was the prudent, proper, and successful method of managing their own affairs. This is their universal answer to all complaints. Their protests against legislative intervention to protect the public always takes this shape, with more or less distinctness of outline. In whatever language they clothe their argument it is the same in substance as that with which Demetrius, the silversmith, defended the sanctity of the temple for which he made shrines: "Sire, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth."

The charge that I am communist enough to wish the destruction of all corporate property is untrue. I think myself the most conservative of citizens. I believe with my whole heart in the rights of life, liberty, and property; and if anybody has struggled more faithfully, through good report and evil, to maintain them inviolate, I do not know who he is. Perhaps I am prejudiced in favor of natural justice and equality. I am convinced that without the enforcement of the fundamental law honest government can not be expected.

But we, the people, have rights of property as well as the corporations, and ours are, or ought to be, as sacred as theirs. Between the great domain which we have ceded to them and that which still belongs to us the line is plainly and distinctly marked, and if they cross it for purposes of plunder they should be driven back under the lash of the law.

Now, I have not the time to quote fully from this splendid speech of Judge Black before the Pennsylvania senate, which had such great effect upon the politics of the country, especially in the Northwestern States. That section of our country, I will say, is fighting ground now for the Democratic party. But I will read his concluding sentences:

We are told that in this struggle for honest government against the power of the railroad corporations the just cause has no chance of success. We do seem to be out on a forlorn hope. The little finger of monopoly is thicker than the loins of the law.

But you could, if you would, effect a perfect reform and yet not hurt a hair on any head—"a consummation most devoutly to be wished."

The people and the Constitution, mutually supporting one another, will be triumphant yet. Meanwhile let all the railroad rings rejoice. This is their day; ours is to come.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these prophetic words of this distinguished jurist, spoken so many years ago, I regard as most appropriate to incorporate into this debate. At last, in accordance with the prophecy of Judge Black, we have arrived at "the consummation devoutly to be wished." To-day the regulation of railways is the most prominent question for the consideration of the President and the representatives of the people in Congress assembled. Men of all parties unite with the people and demand such legislation as shall regulate the rate charged by railroad corporations, treating them in the light of public agents. Talk about your commune! Some reference was made here on yesterday, Mr. Chairman, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] to the effect that this was a drift in the direction of the commune. This measure does not mean communism; it means conservatism. The whole history of the world shows that the arrogance of power of great corporations must be controlled in the interest of the people, otherwise there is a drift toward socialism and toward the commune. [Applause.]

As said by Hon. Martin A. Knapp, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission:

The agitation for a more efficient control of interstate carriers is the outgrowth of an insistent public sentiment and expresses a determined purpose to correct existing abuses. Since the passage of the act to regulate commerce in 1887, which in many respects was understood to be a tentative and experimental measure, no important change or enlargement of its provisions has been made, except the addition of the excellent Elkins law, although its limited scope and insufficient restraints have long been apparent. Meanwhile the railway mileage has increased upward of 50 per cent, revenues have more than doubled, numerous lines formerly independent have been merged into great systems or otherwise brought under unified control, and many other conditions have arisen which were not foreseen or taken into account when the original law was enacted. The time has arrived when this scheme of regulation should be carefully revised not only in its substantive features, but also to an extent in its methods of administration.

MORE EFFECTIVE SUPERVISION OF COMMON CARRIERS NECESSARY AT THIS DAY AND TIME.

There must be, therefore, at this day and time—and it is fair and it is right—a more effective supervision and control of these great corporations. Why? Those who oppose this measure say the railways of the country, with a mileage of 215,000 miles, with $14,000,000,000 of property, great arteries of commerce, add to the growth and the prosperity of the country. I admit this with all my heart, but this great power and this great wealth abused—this great power used to destroy competition—is fatal to our welfare and our prosperity. It is dangerous to our free institutions. It must be curbed, restrained, controlled, directed. No one, certainly not I, would either destroy them or confiscate their property, but the regulation of railroad rates will do neither; Government control will do neither. It will simply correct abuses and restore competition and give the shipper fair treatment—a square deal. [Loud applause.] Has competition in rates been destroyed? Why, certainly. Sixty-five per cent of the entire railway mileage of this country is now in the hands of and controlled by seven great systems—the Vanderbilt system, the Pennsylvania system, the Gould system, the Harriman lines, the Hill system, the Rock Island system, and the Southern Railway system.

The following is a complete analysis of railroad systems:

1. The Vanderbilt system, comprising the New York Central, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, the Michigan Central, the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis, the Pittsburg and Lake Erie, and the Lake Erie and Western.
2. The Pennsylvania system, practically controlling the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway, and the Norfolk and Western Railway, and holding jointly with the New York Central a controlling interest in the Philadelphia and Reading, which in turn controls the Central Railroad of New Jersey.
3. The Gould system, comprising the Wabash Railroad, the Missouri Pacific Railway, the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern, the Texas and Pacific, the St. Louis Southwestern, the International Great Northern, the Wheeling and Lake Erie, the West Virginia Central, the Denver and Rio Grande, and the Western Maryland.
4. The Harriman lines, including the Southern Pacific, Central Pacific, Union Pacific, Oregon Short Line, Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, with large interests in the Illinois Central, the Chicago and Alton, and Kansas City Southern.
5. The Hill system, embracing the Great Northern Railway, the Northern Pacific Railroad, and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway.
6. The Rock Island system, including the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, the St. Louis and San Francisco, the Chicago and Eastern Illinois, and the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf.
7. The Southern Railway system, the same interests controlling nearly all the important railways of the South.

Sixty-five per cent of the railways are so closely united as to amount to a practical community of interests. The remaining 35 per cent are absolutely dependent upon these great consolidations. Therefore competition between carriers by rail, which formerly prevailed when the original interstate-commerce act was passed and which acted as a check and restraint against unreasonable rates, has been to a great extent suppressed and destroyed. In this connection I wish to refer to the inaugural address of our late distinguished colleague, Hon. Claude A. Swanson, governor of Virginia:

On the subject of railroads and transportation the governor said:

"Another question inseparably interwoven with our development and prosperity is a just and proper regulation of the railroads and transportation companies. Whether the products of our farms or factories can find profitable sale in the markets of the world largely depends on the freight charges made by the railroads. Formerly we could depend upon the laws of competition to regulate and control the rates. But consolidation and extension of the 'community of interest' principle among the railroads have destroyed all competition. Railroads may still compete for business, but it is done by other means than cutting or reducing rates. Competition being eliminated as a factor in fixing rates, the Government must exercise its authority and see that the rates fixed are reasonable and just.

ROADS NOT PRIVATE PROPERTY.

"A transportation company should be considered as a partnership, of which the public constitutes one partner and the stockholders the other, each entitled to full and fair consideration. The arrogant claim of some that railroads are private property, and that they have the right to exact what they can and please for their services, is as vicious as the cry of the thoughtless demagogues who would confiscate all investment in these properties. Our policy should be such as to give assurance to those who have and will invest in such properties that they may expect reasonable returns and will receive from us honest, fair, and just treatment."

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO ENACT THIS BILL.

The grant of power to Congress under the Constitution over interstate commerce is extensive and of the largest import. The power is plenary; it is exclusive, and its exercise is "due process of law." It has been so held from the earliest cases down—Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S., which gives a thorough review of the American and English authorities—that when the owner of property devotes it to a use in which the public has an interest he in effect grants to the public an interest in such use and must to the extent of that interest submit to be controlled by the public. The power has no limit, except that it must not be exercised in such a way as to confiscate property. The power may be delegated to a commission to do what? Not to legislate, but to administer. The Interstate Commerce Commission is an administrative board, and has the right to administer the power of Congress in the fixing of railway rates. This is held in many decisions of the Supreme Court and by Judge Dillon, Judge Cooley, and many eminent law authorities. The Constitution says:

Congress has power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court. (Cons., U. S., sec. 8, clause 9.)

To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes. (Cons., U. S., sec. 8, clause 3, art. 1.)

The making and fixing of rates is a legislative, and not a judicial function; and the decisions are uniform in declaring that statutes creating railroad commissions and giving them the power to make and fix rates are not unconstitutional as delegating a legislative power which belongs only to the legislature itself. (Granger Cases, 94 U. S., 113; Georgia R. R. Co. v. Smith, 70 Georgia, 694; Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co., 154 U. S., 362, and many other cases.)

The design and object of that power, as evinced in the history of the Constitution, was to establish a perfect equality among the several States as to commercial rights, and to prevent unjust and invidious distinctions which local jealousies or local and partial interests might be disposed to introduce and maintain. (Veazie v. Moor, 14 How., 574.)

Commerce is a term of the largest import. * * * The power to regulate it embraces all the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted. (Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S., 269.)

Congress has plenary power, subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution, to prescribe the rule by which commerce among the several States is to be governed, and may, in its discretion, employ any appropriate means not forbidden by the Constitution to carry into effect and accomplish the objects of the power given to it by the Constitution. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447.)

The compelling of railway companies to comply with the order of railroad commissioners regulating rates is due process of law. (8 Am. and Eng. Enc. of Law, 911.)

The principal objects of the interstate-commerce act were to secure just and reasonable charges for transportation. * * * (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore and Ohio R. R. Co., 145 U. S., 263.)

It is not doubted that Congress has the power to go beyond the general regulations of commerce which it is accustomed to establish, and to descend to the most minute directions if it shall be deemed advisable. (Cooley, Const. Lim., 732.)

The power granted to Congress to regulate commerce is necessarily exclusive whenever the subjects of it are national or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation throughout the country. * * * In the matter of interstate commerce the United States are but one country, and are and must be subject to one system of regulation, and not to a multitude of systems. (Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 120 U. S.)

The Interstate Commerce Commission is an administrative board, and the courts are only to be resorted to when the Commission prefers to enforce the provisions of the statute by a direct proceeding in the court, or when the orders of the Commission have been disregarded. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific R. R. Co., 162 U. S.)

In the case of Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113, 24 L. ed., 77), the Supreme Court of the United States, after a thorough review of the American and English authorities, has laid down the following fundamental principles governing public carriers and other quasi-public institutions:

"1. Under the powers inherent in every sovereignty a government may regulate the conduct of its citizens toward each other, and, when necessary for the public good, the manner in which each shall use his own property.

"2. It has, in the exercise of these powers, been customary in England from time immemorial, and in this country from the first colonization, to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, auctioneers, innkeepers, and many other matters of like quality, and in so doing to fix a maximum charge to be made for services rendered, accommodations furnished, and articles sold.

"3. The fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution does not in any wise amend the law in this particular.

"4. When the owner of property devotes it to a use in which the public has an interest, he in effect grants to the public an interest in such use, and must to the extent of that interest submit to be controlled by the public.

"5. The limitation by legislative enactment of the rate of charges for services rendered in an employment of a public nature, or for the use of property in which the public has an interest, establishes no new principle in the law, but only gives a new effect to an old one."

Thus the highest court has permanently established the broad principle that the public have the right to regulate charges in all enterprises affected with a public use. To this doctrine all the courts have steadfastly adhered. In this leading case it was also held that the courts had no right to interfere with the rates fixed by the lawmaking power. This doctrine, however, has been since somewhat qualified in the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., 412, 38 L. ed., 1028, 4 Inters. Com. Rep., 1028), and other cases there cited, where it is held that when rates are confiscatory the courts may so declare and relegate the matter back to the lawmaking power for new rates, by which a reasonable profit is left to the carrier. But the principle that the legislative power, either directly, or indirectly through a commission, can fix rates of freight and passenger traffic within this constitutional limitation has been uniformly upheld in all the decisions of the United States Supreme Court upon this subject.

OLNEY'S ARGUMENT.

The ablest argument which has been made upon this subject upon the side of the railroads I have before me here in the North American Review, in an article by Richard Olney. Mr. Olney insists that the prescribing of rates is a legislative function which can not be delegated, and he makes a most adroit and skillful and plausible legal argument upon his side of the question. The arguments of Mr. Olney, able as he is, I think are fully answered in a still later number of the North American Review in an article on Congressional rate making. This article, by Mr. J. B. Cessna, citing the decisions of the Supreme Court, also shows, in the case of Georgia Banking Company v. Smith and other cases in which the State railroad-commission law was attacked, that not only the legislatures of the several States through State commissions, but the Congress of the United States, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, has the undoubted right to delegate its power upon the subject of rates to be administered by a commission. In that article the point is made that this is more just and equitable, because justice is more likely to be done if this power of fixing rates is vested in a body in continual session than if retained by Congress, meeting at long intervals. Has not justice uniformly been done by State railroad commissions?

STATE RAILROAD COMMISSIONS HAVING POWER TO MAKE RATES.

There are thirty-two State railroad commissions, twenty-four of which have power to make rates, as follows—the procedure used is as follows:

Alabama–Arkansas, after giving railroads ten days' notice.

California, are effective after twentieth day of service on railroads.

Florida, after giving notice and hearing all parties interested.

Georgia, joint rates can be made only after hearing, with thirty days' notice.

Illinois, after furnishing railroads with printed copies of schedule.

Indiana–Iowa, must give two weeks' notice after revising maximum rate.

Kansas, can raise rates only after six days' public notice.

Kentucky, after ten days' notice and hearing of railroads.

Louisiana–Maine, after due notice and hearings of railroads.

Minnesota–Mississippi, after ten days' notice to railroads.

Missouri–New Hampshire–North Carolina, North Carolina corporation commission, with powers to fix rates subject to right of railroads to file exceptions within ten days and be heard.

North Dakota, after notice to all parties and hearing.

South Carolina, thirty days' notice before rates become effective.

South Dakota, after ten days' public notice and hearing.

Tennessee, after ten days' notice to railroads.

Texas, after ten days' notice to all interested parties, with hearing. Emergency freight rates after three days' notice to railroads.

So more than half of the States of the Union, for more than a quarter of a century, have had statutes delegating to a commission a rate-making power. These cases have frequently been before the Federal courts and the Supreme Court of the United States; and, in every instance, after full argument and consideration, the courts have held the statutes valid and constitutional, and that such a commission was an administrative board, exercising valid and legal authority.

THE ARGUMENTS OF THE RAILROADS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the arguments of the railroads upon the subject?

They have for the last year or more been assiduously and industriously distributing literature in every direction from one end of the country to the other. They have been making every plea possible against the enactment of this legislation. First, it is said that this legislation means confiscation and the giving of power to the Commission to regulate and to fix all the railroad rates of the country. This is not in accordance with the facts. In the first place, the railways are fully protected in their rights of property by the numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that the power exercised by the Commission shall not be confiscatory. It is provided in this bill that rates must be fairly remunerative. It is not in accordance with the facts, secondly, because under this bill no power is given to the Commission to initiate a rate, the only power being, upon the complaint of a shipper that a rate is unreasonable, after full hearing, to declare what is reasonable and just and enforce that rate as the maximum thereafter to be charged.

It has been argued by the railroads that this legislation would affect all the "Jim Crow" car laws of the several States whereby separate accommodations are provided for the whites and blacks. It is very easy for us to understand that can not be done by this legislation. This is simply an argument for argument's sake and for effect. What are known as the "Jim Crow" car laws of the various States have application only to commerce and traffic within said States, and with their internal commerce and traffic the National Government can not by any legislation interfere. It is said by the railroads it will reduce the wages of employees. Apply to this argument the answer made clearly and effectively by the President of the United States recently when he said to a delegation presenting this kind of an argument that they did not understand the purport and effect of the legislation. Pure and simple it is this, that when a given rate is unreasonable the Commission administering the power delegated by Congress has the right to declare what is a reasonable rate. The wages of railroad employees are not involved. The railroads, like all corporations, will pay as little wages as possible and require as long hours as flesh and blood can endure.

It is not only not in accordance with the bill, Mr. Chairman, to affect the Jim-Crow car laws or wages of employees, but it is also an unfair, unjust, and a false argument to say that the purpose of this legislation is either to confiscate or injure corporations, or that it is any attack upon capital or that its attempted object is against the interest of either capital or labor. These arguments, to my mind, are mere sound and fury, made for the purpose, if possible, of defeating the bill. As said by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], joint author of the Esch-Townsend bill, for which we voted last Congress:

> The railroad corporations are standing in their own light in antagonizing this legislation. It is in their interest, as well as in the interest of the people. Within recent years we have seen in this country that the actions of great corporations has caused a drift toward socialistic ideas, and there has been and is now a drift in the direction of Government ownership. Now, instead of extreme legislation, a legislation which may take from the railroad corporations—public agents—absolute control of their property and turn it over to the National Government, would it not be well for them, I ask, to acquiesce in reasonable and just legislation along this line?

So far as this bill is concerned (the Hepburn bill), drawn by the distinguished and able gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], and which also bears the impress of the efficient labors of my friends, Judge RICHARDSON of Alabama, and Judge ADAMSON and Judge BARTLETT of Georgia, among the most able, diligent, and accurate Members of this House [applause], it seems to me it is fair to the railroads and the people. Former Attorney-General Knox says of this legislation in his Pittsburg speech:

> The railroads enjoy a complete remedy against injustice which it is not proposed to take away, while the public has no effective remedy against injustice. More than such a remedy the public does not ask. Less than such a remedy it never should have been without.
> Exactly such a remedy Congress supposed it gave under the original act to regulate commerce, and it was applied in a number of cases before the decision of the Supreme Court that it was not given by the act.

Now, having seen the attitude of the Democratic party and Republican party and the President upon this subject, having analyzed this bill, and having referred fully to the decisions of the courts, giving undoubted power to Congress to legislate, let us see what has been the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon this subject and their position upon this bill.

I think the attitude of the Commission is most clearly shown in the statement of Hon. Francis M. Cockrell, late United States Senator and now a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Senator Cockrell, in speaking on the subject of legislation, says:

Statement of Interstate Commerce Commissioner Francis M. Cockrell.

> Mr. COCKRELL. Senators of the committee, I can only say to you what I would say if I were still a member of the Senate and called upon to vote on this question.
> Senator CULLOM. That is a pretty good standpoint.
> Senator DOLLIVER. That covers our case exactly.
> Mr. COCKRELL. I would delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power, not to initiate or originate ratings for the railroads, because I do not think that question is at issue at all. I do not think anyone will claim that either Congress or any commission should undertake to take up the entire traffic on our railroad systems and fix rates in advance as to what should be charged. I would delegate to the Commission the power to regulate the rates fixed and declared by the railroad companies under the provisions of the existing law, and to decide whether the rates prescribed by the railroads were reasonable and just or unreasonable and unjust, and to decide after complaint and investigation what was a reasonable and just rate in that case.
> Then after that rate was fixed and found by the Commission, it should continue to be the legal rate until it was otherwise settled, and I would authorize the railroad, after the lapse of a reasonable time from the decision and order of the Commission, to go into the existing courts of the United States, if they desired to contest the ratings found by the Commission. The burden of proof would then be on them to show that the rate fixed by the Commission was not a reasonable and just rate.

The other members of the Commission time and time again have recommended the enlargement of the powers of the Commission simply in order that upon the complaint of a shipper an unreasonable rate may be set aside and a reasonable and just rate fixed and charged for transportation, and in order that such reasonable and just rate may be enforced by the Commission.

THE PEOPLE VOICE THE DEMAND FOR REGULATION OF RAILWAY RATES.

But, Mr. Chairman, in addition to both parties and the President and the Interstate Commerce Commission demanding this legislation, from all over the country, North, East, West, and South, from the farm, from the shop, from the mines, from the factory, from people of all classes and conditions, engaged in agriculture, in manufacturing, and from the great commercial bodies of the country there comes at this time a united demand for legislation upon this subject. [Applause.] I received in this morning's mail a letter from the Southern Hardware Jobbers' Association asking for this legislation.

SOUTHERN HARDWARE JOBBERS' ASSOCIATION,
Fort Smith, Ark., January 25, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES R. THOMAS,
Newbern, N. C.

DEAR SIR: You, personally, are hereby earnestly requested and urged to use your influence and best efforts to secure at the present session of Congress the passage of a law which shall vest the Interstate Commerce Commission with power, where a given rate has been challenged and after full hearing found to be unreasonable, to decide, subject to judicial review, what shall be a reasonable rate to take its place; the ruling of the Commission to take effect immediately and to obtain unless and until it is reversed by the court of review. The amendment of the interstate-commerce act should be sufficiently broad to cover all interstate-transportation service, including all charges, regulations, and exactions in connection therewith, whether for facilities provided by railroads themselves or through arrangements with others.

We herewith append a list of the members of our Southern Hardware Association, by which you will see that we are interested in the whole question from Baltimore to Mexico. You will doubtless recognize amongst this list of members a number of houses whose proprietors are among your most honored constituents.

Very truly, yours, F. B. DUNLOP, President.

There are many large commercial bodies and wholesale establishments in my own State which are asking for it.

These organizations include the North Carolina Pine Association, Charlotte Shippers' Association, Wilmington Chamber of Commerce, Wilmington Merchants' Association, and East Carolina Truck and Fruit Growers' Association.

PRIVATE CARS—REGULATION OF REFRIGERATOR AND PRIVATE CARS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire, before I conclude, to discuss that section of the bill which is, perhaps, of more local interest to me and my people than any other feature. This provision of the bill is as follows:

The term "transportation" shall include cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration or icing, storage, and handling of property transported; and it shall be the duty of every carrier subject to the provisions of this act to provide and furnish such transportation upon reasonable request therefor and to establish through routes and just and reasonable rates applicable thereto.

During the last session of Congress, while the Esch-Townsend bill was under consideration and long before the destruction of the strawberry crop of my section of North Carolina, during the last year, by the failure of refrigerator-car companies to furnish proper service, I spoke, with no uncertain sound, demanding that private and refrigerator cars should be under the supervision and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I said then, and I say now, that in many respects the private car and the refrigerator cars are a good thing for the peach growers of Georgia and the strawberry growers of North Carolina; but I took the position then, and I insist now, as I did February 9, 1905, a year ago, that these facilities of transportation by private cars and refrigerator cars should be regulated as to rates just as much as railways are regulated as to their rates. Representing as I do what is known as the "great trucking district of North Carolina," the great strawberry belt extending from Goldsboro to Wilmington, on the line of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad, I am deeply and intensely interested in this subject. I introduced a bill of my own upon the subject at the very beginning of Congress, and while I do not arrogate to myself the provision of the bill which controls these private cars, at the same time I am glad to see that the provisions of the bill suggested by the Interstate Commerce Committee, in line with my own bill, enlarge the term "transportation" so as to include all icing and refrigeration charges.

The general use of private cars, Mr. Chairman, has grown from a small beginning, almost imperceptible, until now they have become an important factor in the transportation of the country. It is but fair to say that; but it is nevertheless true that the railroads have been held up by the mileage charges of private cars—they charge from three-fourths to 1 cent per mile, whether they travel empty or loaded—and the Armour and other private car lines have been holding up the people by their exorbitant charges for refrigeration.

In their last annual report the Interstate Commerce Commission refers to this matter. I have not the time to read it, but they declare that there is no reason why the refrigeration rates should not be published and maintained and subject to the supervision and control of the Commission. The right of the Commission to regulate the charge for refrigeration as a part of the transportation has been definitely held in a late case, which I have here, in the matter of the transportation and refrigeration of freight shipped to points on the Marquette and Michigan Central Railroad. The Commission shows and states in this case that exorbitant charges have been made for icing and refrigeration, and it declares that the refrigeration is a part of the transportation service, and the charge for that service stands like any other for transportation. The opinion of the Commission says:

In the original report in this case we expressed the opinion that if these respondent railroad companies held themselves out as carriers of perishable fruit they must provide the necessary refrigerator cars for the transportation of that commodity. This results from the elementary principle that at common law railroads must furnish suitable facilities for the conduct of the business in which they engage, and are liable for failure to do so. If judicial authority is needed to confirm the application of that principle to the furnishing of refrigerator equipment, it is found in a very recent utterance of the Supreme Court of the United States (The Southwark, 191 U. S., 1, 48 L. ed., 65, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep., 1).

We held in the former opinion that while it was the duty of the carrier to provide the necessary refrigerator car, it might discharge this duty either by owning the car or by leasing it. It should be carefully observed, however, that the measure of responsibility under which the railroad company rests to the shipper for the sufficiency of the car is exactly the same whether it obtains the equipment by purchase or lease. Pending the performance of the service of transportation the car is to every practical intent the car of the railroad company using it. This has been often affirmed by different courts, and has been expressly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. (Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. Roy, 102 U. S., 457, 26.)

So far as this question has come before the courts, judicial decision apparently confirms the view we have taken. Thus, in New York, P. and N. R. R. Co. v. Cromwell (98 Va., 227, 49 L. R. A., 362, 81 Am. St. Rep., 722, 35 S. E., 444, 17 Am. and Eng. R. Cas. N. S., 328) the plaintiff was a shipper of strawberries, which were transported by the defendant in refrigerator cars. These cars were, in fact, furnished by the California Fruit Transportation Company under an arrangement with the railroad company that it would supply the necessary cars and keep them iced, in consideration of a certain sum which was to be collected by the railroad company of the shipper and passed over to the Transportation Company. The strawberries of the plaintiff were injured, owing to improper icing of the car. The Virginia court held that when the railroad company put this car into its train for the purpose of transporting the fruit of the plaintiff to market it thereby made the car its own and assumed the burden of keeping it properly refrigerated, and that it must answer in damages for failure in that respect.

If, now, the furnishing of refrigeration is incumbent upon the carrier and is a part of the interstate transportation, then the charge for that service stands like any other charge for such transportation. It should be just; it should be nondiscriminative, and it should be published and maintained. We have already pointed out that every consideration which requires that other freight charges should be subject to public supervision applies with equal force to the refrigeration charge. We hold that it is the duty of the carrier to publish, file with the Commission, and observe its icing charges, and that we have the same jurisdiction to inquire into the justice and reasonableness of such charges as of any other charge for the transportation of passengers or property.

CALIFORNIA ORANGE GROWERS INTERESTED.

Mr. Call, of California, in his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, showed the immense profits reaped by the railroad companies and private car lines through their business. In speaking of the citrus fruits transported from California, he says:

Now, the freight which this business pays to carriers—and when I say to the carriers I mean the car lines also—is approximately $400 a car, and for the 30,000 cars that amounts to $12,000,000 which the orange growers of southern California are contributing to the carriers and car lines, and for three years their—the orange growers'—profits have not been over 10 cents a box, or, we will say, about a million dollars a year—one-tenth as much as the amount which has gone to the car lines and to the railways.

[Applause.]

Now, in my own State during the last strawberry season, Mr. Chairman, combined with high refrigeration charges—I think there has been some reduction, but they have been high—there was such a failure on the part of the Armour car line to transport the strawberry crop of eastern North Carolina that the industry, amounting to about $2,000,000 annually, met with apparently at the time almost irretrievable disaster. Immediately following my speech of last session, in which I insisted upon placing the refrigerator cars under the control of the Commission, the strawberry growers of North Carolina were confronted not only by high refrigeration and freight rates, but with a car famine. Now, Mr. Chairman, the result was that along the line of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad, in the strawberry belt, there was a loss of some $750,000 to $1,000,000. The strawberry growers not only depend upon reasonable rates of refrigeration, but depend upon the proper number of cars. Both must be combined. The loss was so great that many crates of strawberries were dumped into White Marsh, and crates were scattered for 2 miles along the side of the railway tracks. Mr. James O. Carr, attorney for the truckers, thus describes the strawberry industry and the losses last spring:

It [the strawberry industry] has existed for twenty-five years along the line of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad, from Goldsboro to Wilmington; yet but few people understand, even in North Carolina, outside of the strawberry belt, the enormous amount of business transacted and the energy expended within this space of thirty days every spring to harvest and market the crop upon which the annual prosperity of a large section of the State is chiefly dependent. Nearly 4,000 acres were planted in strawberries in 1905 from Goldsboro to Wilmington.

The greatest problem of the strawberry growers is the transportation of the crops to northern markets in such condition and with such promptness as to allow the best possible prices, for with heavy freights and low prices the grower realizes that his business is a losing one, and good prices are almost entirely dependent upon the condition of the berry when it reaches the northern markets. There was used first the box car, then the express car, and now the refrigerator car. But during last spring the man who had followed the strawberry business through all of its stages from its infancy, who had fought for reduced rates and better service, who from shipping a few crates of berries on a three days' trip in a box car finally learned to expect hundreds of cars to be handled daily with promptness, for the first time in his life faced a proposition that shook his courage and caused him to hesitate—not only exorbitant rates of the Armour car lines for refrigeration, but a refrigerator-car shortage. Along the line of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad, in the "strawberry belt," the railroad company runs two trains, one known as the "Cannon ball" and the other as the "Pick-up." They are supposed to place refrigerator cars on the side tracks properly iced. First, every morning the "Cannon-ball" train takes up the berries along the line of the railroad, and later in the day the "Pick-up" train takes up those not loaded upon the "Cannon ball." Both trains move every day. The magnitude of the strawberry industry is seen from the fact that from April 22 to May 19 the cars from the "strawberry belt," counted as they passed Rockymount, N. C., and not counting the cars from the Chadbourn section, which go by the way of Fayetteville, were 2,137 cars, carrying an average of 300 crates of berries to a car. If we count 45,000 crates of berries shipped by express and 75,000 crates of berries in the car famine which were dumped along the side of the tracks and in the marsh and river, making a total of 400 cars, we would have altogether 2,537 cars of berries produced last year.

Now, if all of this crop had been marketed it would have amounted to 3,000 carloads, or 900,000 crates, of berries. So long as cars could be furnished, berries sold at the rate of $2 per crate, so that 900,000 crates of berries would give a total of $1,800,000—the value of the strawberry crop for last year.

The freight to New York upon a crate of berries being 80 cents, and more for points farther north from points farther south, there is an income of $720,000 per year for the railroads. These facts indicate the enormous resources of this section and the danger to the strawberry growers of failure of cars, coupled with high charges for refrigeration.

During the past season, during the so-called "car famine," on May 1, known as "big Monday," berries were dumped in "White Marsh," and for 2 miles along the line of the railroad track there were piles of strawberry crates and on either side of the railway was a vast picture of waste and ruin. A part of this loss—$100,000—was made good by the railroad without contest, the railroad being reimbursed by the Armour Company, but the berries dumped along the track and in the marsh constituted but a small part of the entire loss. The amount paid by the transportation companies will not begin to cover the damage. Many of the berries were not picked from the fields.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the car company which had contracted to furnish the cars to the railroad and to move the crop in good time and had agreed to have the cars well iced, and knew the magnitude of the crop, had done its duty, this great sum of money would have been saved to the people of the strawberry belt, the district I have the honor to represent upon this floor. Instead of doing so, where there should have been 1,200 cars up to a certain time, there were only 500 cars. The rate for strawberries, freight and refrigeration, for a carload of 400 crates, is $320 from points on the Atlantic Coast Line in North Carolina to northern points. For a minimum carload of berries the rate is $240. The picking of the berries, the crating, freight, commissions, and hauling costs 5 cents per quart before a cent is realized for land or fertilizers or labor. So that reasonable freight rates and reasonable refrigeration charges are necessary, and delays and car famines are absolutely ruinous to my people.

Mr. MANN. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think he is less likely to have car famines by reducing the cost of refrigeration and the freight rates?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I will say, in reply to the gentleman, that I think we are obliged to have, in order to make the strawberry industry profitable to the grower, both the low refrigeration and freight rate and also the proper number of cars furnished. I think that the refrigeration rate and freight rate can be reduced without any serious injury to the Armour Car Company or the railroad. Whatever benefits the growers benefits Armour and the railroad, increases transportation, and is more profitable to the car company.

Mr. MANN. Is not the car company more likely to take their chances upon locating ice in North Carolina now at a season when ice is hard to get?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I think not. Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion. This bill will authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix reasonable, fair, and sufficiently reasonable freight and refrigeration rates, and I believe that under it protection will be given not only to the shippers generally of the country, but to the truckers and strawberry growers of my district and of the State of North Carolina. They almost lost hope during the last season. If they have any more such experiences the growers, many of them, will largely decrease their acreage or go back to general farming, and the railroad and Armour car lines will find they have "killed the goose that laid the golden egg." [Applause.]

Here is what a leading paper of my district and a leading trucker say:

WE SHALL SEE.

The Truckers' Association, which will meet in Wilmington this week, will make a better contract with the railroad for quicker transportation than ever before. Let us hope so. The railroad companies can see from the shortage in acreage this year that growers are going back to general farming on account of poor transportation last year and for several years gone by. From the car shortage and the poor transportation the railroads will be the losers this season, while the growers got it in the neck last season. It is being clearly demonstrated that unless the railroads do furnish quicker service in the future the truckers will be forced to quit the trucking business entirely throughout the several truck-growing States of the South. The railroads have made many fair promises in the past in regard to transportation and good refrigeration (which Armour & Co. gave them?), and the sad climax was finally reached in the poor service received by the growers last spring. From the terrible service of the railroads millions were lost to the growers, hence for this reason the crop is cut short. It is time to hold a truckers' meeting, and it is high time that a binding contract shall be made with both the railroads and refrigerating companies. Where is the redress for the growers unless such a course is taken in the future? With our rivers and creeks filled with thrown-away berries like they were last year, and with the growers now having gone a year almost without pay, we would like to know the door of hope for the truckers if the same conditions exist again. Railroads are common carriers, and the courts ought to uphold the growers for the hundreds of claims now pending.

THE TRUCK CROP OUTLOOK—40 PER CENT DECREASE IN STRAWBERRIES HERE, SAYS MR. ENGLISH.

The current issue of the Carolina Fruit and Truckers' Journal, of Wilmington, contained a forecast of the outlook for the truck crop this year. Letters from prominent men throughout the trucking belt were given, and the following one from our townsman, Mr. W. F. English, will be of interest to our readers.

Replying briefly to your favor of recent date, I beg to say that the strawberry acreage in and around Mount Olive has been materially lessened, and I feel safe in making the assertion that the decrease will amount to about 40 per cent. The disastrous results of last season, brought about by the lack of transportation facilities, disgusted many of the growers, and caused them to abandon the business and turn their attention to cotton, which at present prices they find far more profitable. We have been shipping from this station for several years past from 60,000 to 70,000 crates, but for the coming season 40,000 will take the crop. I am glad to state, however, that what berries we have are looking unusually well. I incline to the opinion that I never have seen the vines in better condition, and unless we have an unusually severe winter from now on we expect an excellent quality of fruit. It may not be amiss to add in conclusion that our crop of all kinds of fruits and vegetables will be smaller than last season.

Yours, truly, W. F. ENGLISH.

But I hope that notwithstanding the great loss of the past year this legislation will be some encouragement to the strawberry growers of my district, and with that indomitable pluck and thrift and intelligence which is the heritage of the men of all that section of country they will take fresh courage, and the growth of that great industry will continue. These people are equal to emergencies, they are a brave and heroic people. They are the descendants of the men who fought at Moores Creek and in our other great Revolutionary battles. They are among the most intelligent, conservative, law-abiding, and God-fearing people on earth. For their rights and their interests, so far as I have light to see them, I shall always raise my voice upon the floor of the House of Representatives or elsewhere. I demand this legislation in behalf of my people as well as in behalf of the people of the United States. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction to the debate upon this important measure.

The bill (No. 12987) under consideration is in the main the more satisfactory railroad-rate bill than ever hitherto offered to Congress. In my opinion, it is open to criticism, which may however, be said of any proposition. As the unanimous report of a committee made up of able and painstaking men, it is entitled to respectful and favorable consideration. While there is room for honest differences of opinion, the report shows that the views of the Democratic minority have received attention, and in most cases have been adopted. I congratulate the committee on the excellent report, and under the circumstances, all things considered, I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

In order to fully understand the situation a little introduction as to the history of rates may not be out of place. The present system is the result of years of experience, of conflict between railroads and shippers, of adjustments by chambers of commerce and boards of trade, of battles in the legislatures and courts between the Government officials and the railroad men, and many other things which have influenced the development of the railroad organization of the world.

When railroads were started years ago it was understood that they were to be operated like canals and toll roads—that is, the road was to be owned by the railroad company, the vehicles or rolling stock, to be owned by individuals or companies independently, and the laws were made accordingly. For years these ideas prevailed, although in actual practice it was found almost impossible to have these two functions—the ownership and the operation—separated.

It will be remembered that even to-day canals are owned by one company or the State, the boats are owned independently, and a toll for the use of the canal paid to the owning company or the State. Until toll roads were gradually bought by the State the road was owned separately, and the owners of carriages or other vehicles had to pay tolls to the owners of the roads for their use.

But in the case of the railroads their economic use demands a swift motive power and other technical limitations which it would be almost impossible for owners of cars to provide. Therefore the owners of the road (the actual rails, property on which they are laid, stations, ferries, etc., bridges, tunnels, etc.) also supplied the cars, or rolling stock, motive power, etc., and gradually came to exercise all the functions which in other modes of transportation were exercised separately. In this way all the early legal struggles were fought out until it came to be admitted in law as well as in practice that if the railroads were to be managed economically and efficiently all the functions must be exercised by one company.

Now, in the cases of canals and toll roads, tolls were collected at fixed rates, supposed to include profit or interest on the capital invested, cost of maintaining the canal or road in efficient order, etc. The owners of boats or vehicles using the canals and roads charged passengers so much per mile, and freight so much per mile per ton, modified or increased by special conditions, such as greater liability to damage, bulk as compared with weight, and many others. Freight charges were therefore based on certain classifications, and rates were fixed accordingly. In the case of water transportation, as the roadway was provided by nature, there were no tolls to be paid; only charges for the service rendered, just as in the case of the owners of cars on the railroads.

But since the owners of railroads had to exercise all functions, in fixing their "rates" they had to combine the "tolls" for the use of the road and "charges" for the transportation of freight and passengers; these rates were therefore a combination, and their proper fixing became a very difficult and expert matter. The two elements in the rate were often in direct conflict on economic grounds, and they were further complicated by variety of classification, by the necessity of adjusting through rates when the freight passed over two or three lines; by questions of whether the rate included collection of freight from the shipper and delivery to the consignee or whether there should be an extra for this included in the rate; also whether the rate was sufficient to cover cost of loading and unloading, storage in stations, extra liability on the more fragile varieties of freight, and so on, in almost endless variety.

However, a complete tariff of rates was worked out in the course of years, after much heartbreaking, bankruptcy of roads, wreck of various industries depending on freight rates, etc. These rates depended, of course, on distance, on classification, and on competition with other modes of transportation—by water, other roads, etc. Then the rates commenced on a new series of modifications enforced by legislatures and parliaments, and if there was trouble before there was almost pandemonium then. It is too long and complicated to go into, but I shall try to illustrate by a few examples.

Suppose two towns 100 miles apart, with two roads operating between, one with 110 miles of roadway, the other (more indirect) with 160 miles. In the course of economic history the shorter road always "made the rate," and if the longer road wanted any of the business it had to meet the shorter road's rate. But on all intermediate points on the longer road there was, of course, but one railroad, and the old local rates were maintained; otherwise the railroad might as well go out of business. Since the cost of transportation was greater than on the shorter road and the income was the same on through traffic, they were forced to make up the difference.

In this way it came to pass that the rates for the short haul were often higher than rates for the long haul. The people on this longer road therefore appealed to the legislature for protection, and of course, got it; a law would be passed prohibiting the road from charging more for the short than the long haul. The road then went into bankruptcy, and the people on the longer railroad found themselves cut off from their fellow-men without proper railroad communication. Again they appealed for protection, and the courts perhaps would declare the rate-fixing law unjust or unconstitutional, or the legislature would repeal it. However, in the meantime the shorter road would endeavor to make an arrangement with the defunct road which might better accomplish the object and bring to life what the inexpert rate makers had killed. [Applause.]

By increasing the through rates on both roads, by means of a traffic agreement, or pool, they could then decrease the rates on the shorter distances without loss of income; in other words, the people on the shorter road would lose the advantage of their geographic position and would have to pay part of the cost of transportation to points on the longer road. True this brought both roads to life and everybody was served with railroads.

But this traffic agreement looked like a monopoly, and the legislature and courts were again appealed to, and finally all traffic agreements (or "wicked pools," as they were called) were denounced and forbidden under heavy penalties. Once more the longer roads tumbled into bankruptcy, and the last state was worse than the first. Then came joint ownership of both roads. This in turn was forbidden.

I don't imagine that there is any need of going further into this development of the entire system of railroads and their rates. I think enough has been said to show that it is one of the most complicated problems with which modern business and commerce has had to deal. It is the result of years of experience, and none but trained experts should be allowed to meddle with it. It is much more complicated than calculating rates for insurance, because it is based on so many varying conditions, whereas the factors in life insurance are practically fixed—mortality, interest, and expense. Yet if only experts are competent to deal with insurance, how much more so is this true in the case of railroad rates. [Applause.]

As railroad agreements or pools are against the law in the United States to-day, the roads have no way in which to protect themselves against the shippers except by publication of their own tariff schedules; and hard experience has shown how futile this is. It is admitted by all at this time that the shippers practically fix the rates, and that the roads have either to take the freight at the rates fixed by the shippers or go without the business. To illustrate: Suppose a large shipper in Chicago demands a certain reduced rate on heavy shipments to New York, the business to be steady all the year round. All the roads out of Chicago refuse to cut below their printed schedules, and it is up to the shipper. He immediately concentrates all his shipments on one road; the others get nothing. These others immediately suspect that the favored road has given a rebate (as a matter of fact it has not); they immediately, in the interests of their stockholders, give in, and the shipper has his way. By this sharp trick he has compelled all the roads to violate their schedules in spite of themselves, especially since the law forbids them to get together to find out the scheme.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GOULDEN. Certainly.

Mr. RYAN. Does not the gentleman believe that the Elkins law practically prohibited rebates, and that with the passage of the present law giving publicity the continuance of these rebates will be practically eliminated?

Mr. GOULDEN. I believe that will be so if the law is properly carried out. Unfortunately, there are a great many laws on the statute books that are allowed to sleep; hence are useless. In other words, they are not working as they should.

Mr. RYAN. But not the fault of the law, I take it.

Mr. GOULDEN. No; not the fault of the law, but the failure to have them properly executed. The greatest possible publicity should be had regarding all corporations. In this lies a certain remedy for the many evils under which the people suffer.

In relation to the private-car evil, I strongly indorse the position taken, on Wednesday last, by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. The amendment offered by him meets with my unqualified approval, and should be adopted.

It was as follows:

Provided, That all ventilator cars, refrigerator cars, oil or tank cars, including express company and express cars, and any and all cars which have heretofore been termed "private cars," used in the transportation of any article or commodity of interstate or foreign commerce, are hereby declared to be and are common carriers and subject to all laws, rules, and regulations regulating or affecting common carriers in the transportation of articles or commodities of interstate and foreign commerce.

Provided further, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any railroad company engaged in the business of a common carrier to contract with any person, firm, or corporation, being the producers or shippers of any article or commodity entering into interstate or foreign commerce, for the shipment or transportation of such article or commodity when such article or commodity is offered for shipment or transportation in ventilator cars, refrigerator cars, tank cars, or private cars of any character whatsoever, owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by such producers or shippers. To be a stockholder in, or director or officer of, any company owning or controlling such ventilator cars, refrigerator cars, tank cars, or private cars of whatever character shall be considered as having such an interest as is prohibited by this act.

While on the question of amendments, I would heartily indorse several proposed in the able and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], as well as the one offered by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], making the act of the receiver of rebates from the railroad companies a misdemeanor, with the severest penalty known to this class of law-breakers. [Applause.]

Therefore the evils complained of to-day are not the evils of the railroads (for they certainly dislike to make rebates or lose income), but the evils of the greedy, money-bloated shippers, who comprise the large manufacturing interests of the country, all the dealers in foodstuffs, raw materials, natural products —minerals, etc., for instance, iron and coal—in fact, all the business corporations of the country. They are the same people who are protected by the present Republican tariff, and the cry for rate legislation is simply their cry for greater profits through lower freight rates. [Applause.]

If the general public, the people who have to buy and use the freight shipped, would be benefited, rate legislation would be a grand good thing; but I fear that lower rates will not mean lower cost of food and clothing and the necessaries of life. All demands for lower rates or for adjustment of rates come from the numerous trusts and monopolies, composed of merchants and manufacturers generally, the very same people who insist upon high protective tariffs. The general public are never heard of in their deliberations, except as being the ones to whom they are to sell their goods. The great trouble is that the plain people are not organized for their own protection, and therefore receive no consideration anywhere.

However, the present unanimous drift of opinion among lawmakers is to confer the rate-making power on the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Esch-Townsend bill in the last House provided for that, and the bill already agreed on in the present session now under discussion—the Hepburn bill—provides something similar, though in a greatly improved form. It is admitted on all sides that rate making is legislative, and that Congress and Congress only has power to make rates. Whether they can delegate their powers to a commission is a matter of opinion as well as expediency, and is for Congress and the Supreme Court to decide. If the bill passes both Houses it will mean that Congress has delegated its powers in this matter and that the Commission (an administrative department or bureau in the legal aspect) will exercise this important function.

If justice is to be done to all concerned, and especially to the people, who in the end will suffer the cost of all experiments and who foot all the bills anyway, then it should be provided in some way that one or more of the Commissioners should be experts in railroad matters.

The Supreme Court has decided in a large number of cases that, while rate making is legislative, the justice or reasonableness of the rates after they are fixed is a matter for the courts—that is, all questions arising between the rate-making power and the shipper or carrier must be decided by the courts. I believe that the Hepburn bill provides that the Commission will fix the rates, which are to go into effect at the end of thirty days, and that the courts will pass judgment as to their fairness whenever questions are raised.

The bill that passed last Congress, and against which I had the honor of casting my vote, was exceedingly objectionable. The provision creating a special court with its heavy expenses, the failure to reach the private-car and terminal-charge evils, caused the Senate to refuse last year to consider the action of this body. The thousands of private cars of the meat, fruit, and other trusts dictated terms to the railroads and compelled compliance with their demands.

The same is equally true of the terminals. With the indulgence of the Members of the House, allow me to give a few of the many cases familiar to the country:

The Union Railroad Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., less than 10 miles in length, and connecting the great plants of the steel trust at Homestead, Braddock, and Duquesne, secures an average of one-third of the freight charges on all freight entering or leaving from all points in the United States.

The Monongahela and Southern Railroad Company, of Pennsylvania, 1 mile in length, connecting the works of Jones & Laughlin, of the South Side, Pittsburg, with the Baltimore and Ohio, the Pennsylvania lines, and the Lake Erie roads, secures one-fourth or more of the freight charges to all points in the country, exacted as tribute from the railroads mentioned.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD], in a forceful speech on the floor of the House recently, gave many startling facts of the outrageous and exorbitant charges of the St. Louis Terminal Railroad. He showed that the terminal charged five times as much for a 2-mile haul as the railroads did for a 50-mile run. The same conditions exist in every large city in this country. I doubt if the bill now under consideration will effectually remedy this glaring evil, to which the railroads are subject and for which the ordinary people must pay the freight. [Applause.]

The meat in the Hepburn bill now under consideration is contained in the report of the committee and in the new section, to be known as section 24. This provides as follows:

That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of seven members with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10,000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the Commissioners and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the Commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1911, one for a term expiring December 31, 1912. The terms of the present Commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present Commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional Commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the Commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than four Commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.

The only difference between the Republicans and Democrats on this question in the past has been that the former were looking after the interests of the shippers, the protected classes, and thus living up to their reputation of being their friends. The Democrats are and always have been looking to the interests of the people, the consumers, on whom the protected classes grow rich. In the matter of rate making this is a very important distinction indeed. Public sentiment has forced the Republican party to the Democratic belief and doctrine.

The national platforms of 1904 of the two great parties on this question are as follows.

The Democratic platform:

We demand an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief from the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation. We demand a strict enforcement of existing civil and criminal statutes against all such trusts, combinations, and monopolies; and we demand the enactment of such further legislation as may be necessary to effectually suppress them.

Any trust or unlawful combination engaged in interstate commerce which is monopolizing any branch of business or production should not be permitted to transact business outside of the State of its origin. Whenever it shall be established in any court of competent jurisdiction that such monopolization exists, such prohibition should be enforced through comprehensive laws to be enacted on the subject.

The Republican platform:

Laws enacted by the Republican party which the Democratic party failed to enforce and which were intended for the protection of the public against the unjujst discrimination or the illegal encroachment of vast aggregations of capital have been fearlessly enforced by a Republican President and new laws insuring reasonable publicity as to the operations of great corporations, and providing additional remedies for the prevention of discrimination in freight rates, have been passed by a Republican Congress.

This was the first ever placed in the platform of that party on this subject. Both speak for themselves.

The credit for this declaration, as well as for the hearty support that the measure under consideration is receiving from our friends on the other side of this Chamber, belongs to the President, who is thoroughly alive to the demands of the people. To the Democratic party belongs the credit for initiating and pressing this meritorious legislation.

Questions might be raised as to whether the Interstate Commerce Commission, even with the enlarged powers to be granted, would be able to remedy the evils complained of. The Elkins antirebate law is in operation at present, yet the Commission is complaining that it is ineffective. Within a few months it has been necessary to make a number of arrests and indictments; and the indications are that the Hepburn proposed law will prove as ineffectual as all previous efforts of Government to regulate this matter, unless a strong public sentiment is aroused.

Will the new law finally stop the evils due largely to the shippers? Or will these wily people find the usual means of getting around it? The experience of the State of Pennsylvania with the oil trust was that, in spite of years of adverse lawmaking, and of every method of repression and oppression known to legislatures and courts, the trust beat them out. Will it be the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission? In the interest of the people, who are entitled to a "square deal," I hope not. [Applause.]

Continued failure must lead to the question of Government ownership, short of which it would not seem as though the matter could be regulated. When all other means are found to be inadequate, the country will have to face that question.

Both of the great political parties are admitting that municipal ownership of the public utilities is essentially sound doctrine. The recent elections in Chicago and New York have demonstrated that this idea is popular with the people. The sentiment is growing and will soon sweep not only the cities, but the States as well. Before many years have passed Congress will be called on to meet this great and important question.

In my judgment the best way to regulate rates on railroads is to improve our waterways—the natural highways of trade and commerce. Congress has not treated this subject in a broad and liberal spirit. The meager sums appropriated by each Congress, less than twenty millions, is a mere bagatelle when compared with the munificent appropriations made for the Army and the Navy. A sum not less than thirty millions annually should be set aside for the development of the country's magnificent rivers and harbors. The Harlem River Ship Canal, in my district, though less than 6 miles in length, with an immense traffic, growing by leaps and bounds yearly, has been under way for more than thirty years and is now only about half completed. This is but one of many instances all over this country.

The State of New York, appreciating the importance and necessity for maintaining its waterways to insure competition and fair, honest rates for the people, is now expending $101,000,000 in improving its canals. When finished from the Lakes to the ocean it will do more to regulate rates than any act of Congress can possibly do in that State.

Let the people awaken to the great importance of water transportation and demand from their representatives in Congress fitting and adequate sums for this purpose, and when that becomes an accomplished fact the Interstate Commerce Commission can be abolished and its failures forgotten.

This measure is of such importance, so universally demanded, and so entirely in accord with Democratic doctrine as enunciated in the national platforms of 1896, 1900, and 1904 that I shall support it in the interests of the people as the best obtainable at this time, and worthy of trial. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the gentleman from Iowa, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, in an important sense the problems of railway regulation is but a branch of that larger and more important question of the relation of the State to corporations. While business activity has been increasing with marvelous strides corporations have been occupying a constantly increasing share of the field of operations. They have to do not merely with commerce and transportation, but pertain even to the affairs of social and domestic life. Some time since I listened to the argument of an eminent lawyer of the old school, who said:

> The body politic is plastered all over with corporations. The time has come when, if the children and the wife think they can manage better than the head of the family, they may have themselves incorporated into a trust company and have it act as guardian for the old man.

In no country are the corporations so powerful or so unrestrained as in our own. Even in absolute and limited monarchies the power of the crown is brought to bear upon their operations in such a manner as to restrain them within narrower limits and to create a stricter responsibility. In some States of the Union the extent and the variety of powers granted to them are such as to be inconsistent with that opportunity for individual action and that equality which are at the very foundation of our institutions. A principal cause is the fact that our enterprises are conducted upon an enormous scale. Those of us who are not yet past middle life can remember the time when a large share of our manufacturing was done in the little shop. The employer had ten, twenty, or thirty employees. He mingled with them in their work; sometimes took his place at the bench; knew of the conditions in which they lived; informed himself whether their children were at school or not, and if one of them should die, he joined the funeral cortege that went to the hillside cemetery to see his employee laid away in his last resting place. It was like a golden age of cooperation and industrial peace. Now all this is changed. As we approach the factory we find that it covers acres of ground. There is an army of employees within. We recognize the whirlwind sound of steam, the din of a multitude of wheels, the intricacies of modern mechanism; tools and appliances which can say to the workman: "I will partake of your toil with muscles which never grow weary and with a breast which never faints." Many an employee regards his employer as one who doles out from a great accumulated fund only just so much as he must. He does not regard his wages as having any relation to the expenses and profits of the business. On the other hand, the head of the establishment is prone to look upon his employees as but mere cogs in the great mechanism which performs his work.

A distinguished jurist has asserted that two corporations in this country in the magnitude of their fiscal operations surpass the Government of the United States itself with its 80,000,000 of people. Not only are we confronted by present conditions, but the prospect for the future is for still greater and further enlargement of the activities of these great aggregations. In power and influence they threaten to overshadow the State itself, and the question arises, Shall these agencies which are created and permitted by the State have this preponderating, this unusual amount of power? The necessity for effective, intelligent regulation is one of the pressing needs of the time. There is a gathering storm which we must recognize, and which those must recognize who are interested in these great combinations, else worse results will come to them and to the country as well. Dishonesty and oppression have too often characterized their management. This crying demand for regulation is the one great reason for passing this bill.

Transportation has assumed an exceptional importance. It has grown more rapidly and had more to do with the development of the country than other departments of commerce or industry. A distinguished statistician made the generalization in 1896 that transportation energy had increased three times faster than production. Population has increased; wealth has increased more than population; consumption and production have increased still more, but transportation has increased more than all. The consumer no longer depends for his supplies upon his own city or his own county. The merchant seeks even at the farthest bounds the article which his customers prefer. The weight of what we consume is thus increasing, and the distance which it is carried. This exceptional growth of transportation gives to railway regulation primary importance in the adjustment of the great changes which have occurred by the increased power of corporations.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my intention to vote for and support this bill. Two of the great objects to be gained by it are, first, power to declare a rate unreasonable and fix one in its place; second, to make that decision fixing the rate prima facie conclusive, so that it may go into effect at once.

In saying this I am not unmindful of the intricacies and difficulties of the problem. No one can be sure what the court of last resort will say in regard to the exercise of this power by a commission. And in this connection I should be glad if the eminent chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. HEPBURN], in his concluding remarks upon this bill, would give to the House his opinion of the distinctive functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. What is that Commission? Is it exclusively an executive body, exercising powers bestowed upon it by Congress, or does it have both executive and judicial functions? What are the powers which can be given to it which will best subserve the purpose in view? I say I am not sure what the court of last resort will say, neither am I sure what will result when the power to regulate rates is exercised by this Commission. With 160,000 rate schedules, related one to the other much as each card is to every other in a house of cards, it is difficult to decide upon any one without affecting all the rest. But this may be asserted with confidence: There are cases in which rates are oppressive, in which the policies pursued by the railroads have not subserved the public interest or established the best system of rates. I do not anticipate that the Commission will create havoc. I do not anticipate that its orders will be so revolutionary in their nature or have to do with such a variety of rates as to interfere with the general methods of business adopted by the railroads.

It is a notable fact that when the interstate-commerce act of 1887 was under consideration the dominant idea was not that the revenue of the railways was too large, but that their rates were badly adjusted; that in some instances the prices fixed worked injustice to individuals and to communities, and that power should be given to the Commission to correct inequalities and to do away with abuses.

It is easy to recognize the dangers of rate making. There are many complaints of discrimination. There is a possibility that the Commission will be choked by the multitude of these complaints. It is to be feared that some city which has the most aggressive and able chamber of commerce will come before the Commission and make a showing in regard to conditions such that its members will say, "The rates to and from your city should be corrected," while there may be many other places less aggressive but equally discriminated against, which will be unable to obtain the ear of the Commission.

In this connection I want to advocate further legislation on this subject if, in the operation of the law, it shall seem that it does not work well. The determination of rates is a great power to give to any executive body. There are questions which the Commission has sought to decide in the past which properly belong to the domain of legislation. I will instance a few.

Under the disposition of railroad managers to obtain business and to enable localities to ship their products to foreign markets with profit, a differential is granted on freight intended for shipment abroad. If a pound of meat or a barrel of flour is brought from Chicago to Boston and is to be consumed in that neighborhood, there is a certain rate upon it; if it is intended for export abroad, there is a lower rate. At Galveston, as I understand, the railway rate to that port, if an article is intended for export, is one-half what it is if intended for domestic consumption. There is a question of public welfare involved here. In the neighborhood of Boston there are numerous manufacturing cities. They are nearer to the food supply and are entitled to lower cost of food, and yet, under a differential, these articles which they consume can be brought from the prairies of the West and delivered to competing manufacturing towns in the valley of the Seine, in Lancashire, or in Germany, at a price not greater, unless there is a duty, than that at which they can be furnished in Massachusetts.

Take the other standpoint. There is a differential on articles imported. Goods coming from Germany, France, and England are taken to the interior at a price in some instances not greater, in fact, occasionally even less, than is charged to transport similar goods from a seaport of the United States to the interior. Shall it be in the power of transportation companies or of a commission to say whether that is a proper method of regulating transportation? Such differentials might destroy the advantages afforded to the local producer by protective tariffs and nearness to the consumer. Is it not a great question of public policy which this Congress and this House should decide?

Then, again, as to the long and short haul. For the cities of New York and Chicago better supplies are obtained at remote distances than near at hand. So in New York the railways brought milk and other articles from well away in the State at a price practically the same as within a radius of 30 or 40 miles. A similar instance may be noted in furnishing supplies at Chicago. Early vegetables could be shipped from near to the Gulf, and it was thought good business policy by the railroads to encourage the industry of raising early vegetables by carrying them to Chicago at a rate not greatly in excess of that imposed for places near by. Is that a question for an executive body to decide? Is it not a question for Congress to determine? Is it not true that the "dangers," as they are called, the doubts of the validity of the powers conferred upon this Commission, might well be solved by laying down certain great principles by this Congress? Much has been said about the real or imaginary loss of prestige of the House of Representatives. We shall occupy the position which we deserve to occupy, not by bewailing the loss of prerogatives or seeking to exploit the individual Member, but by observing our responsibilities under the Constitution, by meeting the great questions of the time and solving them ourselves, and not leaving them to the Executive Departments of the Government. [Applause.]

Nevertheless, there must be numerous questions relating to individual cases or localities which involve so much detail that in the very nature of the case they can not be determined by this body. These must be left to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we have every reason to have confidence that its members will exercise their powers wisely and honestly for the good of the whole country.

The very great reason for the taking effect of rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission within thirty days is that any other method creates not only serious hardship but grave injustice. It has been computed that the average time between the making of a complaint to the Commission and the final decision is four years and a half. There is a very familiar case in which after nine years the question was about as unsettled as it was at the very beginning, because it was sent back again to the Commission for further consideration and decision. Now, it is not difficult to see that so considerable a delay is a denial of justice and of right.

Prices which the producer receives are fixed according to the rate at the time he sells his product. If the commission merchant is buying wheat in the Dakotas or Nebraska, he computes the price at Chicago, or other market, and after deducting the freight, his commission, or profit, pays what is left to the farmer. He has redress under the present system, or he has promise of redress, but who is the loser? It is the farmer, who receives for his wheat a price determined by the rate in vogue at the time. He has no right to bring an action against the railway company, and if the delay is as long as in most instances, the time goes by when the merchant can gain anything from the correction of an unjust or unreasonable rate. And thus it may be confidently asserted that one of the best features of this bill is that which seeks to make the corrected rate immediately effective, so that those who ought to have the benefit of that correction may have it and have it immediately.

There are other objects to be gained by this bill. It will be conceded that the form of discrimination most urgently requiring attention is the rebate. It was thought that the Elkins Act of 1903 would correct that evil, but a variety of ways have been discovered by which that act can be evaded.

Human ingenuity has probably never been exercised with more acuteness than in avoiding the law in regard to rebates. Terminal charges, the use of elevators and of warehouses, switches, and branch lines owned by shippers have all been utilized in such a manner as to continue the most odious forms of discrimination. In addition to these there are the refrigerator cars and other kinds of private cars, all of which make it possible to give advantages to the favored shipper. It is a well-known fact that in past years persons engaged in trade have found that their business was conducted at a loss except for the rebates which they received, which were of so large an amount as not only to make up for the loss, but to afford a profit. Every device has been resorted to which was possible to conceal the unequal treatment of different shippers. Fictitious damage claims against the railway have been resorted to as a means for the payment of rebates. So far as legislation can correct these evils this bill corrects them. It strikes a blow at the abuses of the private car system, switches, branch lines, and terminal facilities. It provides that if the shipper renders any service in transportation the allowance for such service shall be no more than is just and reasonable, and gives the Commission power to prevent the partnership between railways and those who have received favors in this specious form.

Two things are to be considered in the regulation of railway rates—discrimination between individuals and discrimination between places. The discrimination between places it may be almost impossible to do away with, because of differences in geographical location and means of access. One place is located on a waterway and can obtain cheaper carriage of freight on that account. Another may be located where there is a plurality of railways and there is a certain element of competition. That man would be very bold indeed who would seek by legislation to establish rules under which it could be said that all places in the country were to be treated alike. But as regards discrimination between individuals, there can be no question but that it can and should be corrected. The very basis of all our laws is equality of opportunity. The great combinations which have grown up in the country have attained their colossal development very largely because of discrimination in freight rates. We can not have equality, industry can not gain the most symmetrical and helpful growth, unless the least shipper—the one who forwards the least amount of freight—can have his goods carried on the iron rails just as cheaply and just as favorably as the greatest combination.

There may be instances in which there can fairly be a difference according to quantity shipped as between the partial carload and the full car, but so far as uniform regulations are concerned we shall not have done our duty, nor will the country have an opportunity for development in the line in which it should develop unless every effort is exerted to enforce absolute equality between all the shippers of the country. It is always to be noticed that discriminations in rates, as well as other discriminations, aid the strong and destroy the weak. The large shipper studies the problem. He knows when to take his freight to the railway for shipment. He knows what line will carry it most promptly and cheaply, and more than all, he has the ear of the traffic manager, and if any favors are to be given to anyone he obtains them.

In speaking upon this subject, Mr. Chairman, we should not pass from it without a fair tribute to the railways of the country. There have been no organizations in this or any other land which have done more to increase wealth and build up a country's prosperity than the railways of the United States. They have made unoccupied areas to teem with population and abound in wealth, and by low charges on food products and raw materials they have made possible the capture of foreign markets and a phenomenal increase of manufactures. If I were to make any one criticism upon their management it would be that they have too eagerly observed the rule, "Get business." While they have shown liberal and broad-gauged ideas in measures adopted to develop the country, yet in the hurry and competition to get traffic they have oftentimes disregarded that which was best for great localities and paid too little respect to the rights of individuals. Perhaps almost anyone engaged in the business would pursue the same course. I especially deprecate the indiscriminate abuse of them. No profit can be gained by the violent declamation which in some places is indulged in against corporations. I hear speakers whose eyes are filled with visions of the octopus; a legion of monsters surrounds them intent upon taking the lifeblood of the people. Such talk as theirs will lead to no salutary reform. No glittering generalities will answer the purpose. We must descend to details and work out these problems with care and soberness, with an understanding of all their varied aspects, which will enable us to act wisely and well. In saying this I would say not one word in extenuation of the discriminations and violations of the law which have characterized the fixing of freight rates. There have been many plans to discriminate and grant rebates, which have originated in that unexplored mysterious realm, the traffic manager's conscience—plans and schemes which would not bear the light of day; but if we compare the railway management with that of other great enterprises I think we may say without fear of contradiction that it has been characterized by a progressiveness, by a desire for the development of the country, and by a liberality unsurpassed.

And we should especially hold the shipper who holds a club over the railway manager alike culpable with the railway manager himself. [Applause.] If necessary, impose upon him the same penalty by bringing him before the court and subjecting him to the same punishment. What is the situation? Competition is sharp, though gradually disappearing, and I am not sure but it is best that it should disappear or become less and less. Every railway must seek for business as it seeks for life, and every traffic manager is regarded as successful or unsuccessful just in proportion as he obtains business and swells the receipts of his company. Possibly it would be best to give to each railroad of this country an exclusive field of its own to work in. In France they have five or six railway systems, each supreme in its own sphere, which no other railway enters. There are noncompetitive points here where a single railway has a monopoly, but at points where there is competition by rail or by water such a monopoly is impossible. Thirty years ago there was almost ruinous competition between the railways. Freight was occasionally carried at very much less than cost. This did not benefit anyone particularly. The large shipper gained the benefit of the low rates and the smaller shipper took his turn when they were restored to normal figures. Then there were "gentleman's agreements," made to be observed for a time and then broken; made to give out to each other as if they were to be maintained, but to be broken in secret. Now, we are coming to a time of combination. Not only are there several great railway combinations under one management, and these combinations include railways which are in competition with each other, but there is a general disposition all along the line to act in concert. I may remark, in passing, that this bill will diminish the influence of competition, because competition feeds upon rebates and discriminations, but if the force of these factors in reducing rates is done away with, it is all the more necessary that some governmental agency should control charges and make them reasonable and fair to the people.

In explaining the misdeeds of the railroads and trust magnates, I would say, digressing somewhat from the subject immediately before us, that if we seek for the most responsible source of the evil we shall find it in the ideals of our people. We have had sickening displays of dishonesty by men in high places. Some who are held up to public esteem and respect have been guilty of dishonesty, which in a common rascal would be regarded as sufficient to send him to prison. Why is it? More than anything else, it is because as a people we have enthroned success, because the injunction "Put money in thy purse" is the one which is most observed, because we have before us numerous illustrations of men who have achieved colossal fortunes, giving them a power equal to that of dukes and kings, whose success renders them objects of public admiration. So long as such ideals are in the minds of the people the boundary line between honesty and dishonesty is easily broken down, provided success is the result of questionable operations. What is the use of your giving oft-repeated homilies about the public welfare and standards of honesty to one of whom it is demanded that he achieve signal success and surpass all those with whom he is placed in competition? Condemn him if he departs one iota from the pathway of honesty, but condone his failure if he does his duty, and then you will have better ideals. [Applause.] In these days a boy who is coming to manhood now is brought up to admire the great railway magnates and the managers of great corporations, and his pathway is pointed out in that direction rather than in the way of statecraft and of those thousand employments where a real benefit to the people is possible, though from an humbler station. When we are condemning others, let us ask ourselves if we are not to blame. How are we going to correct it? It will be impossible to tear up the evil at the root, except by a long process of education by which it shall be shown that life has prizes infinitely more valuable than the gaining of a great fortune. But by legislation we can do much to bring about the desired result by providing for publicity in the management of these great organizations; by checks and safeguards which shall remove temptation; by enforcing the law in such a manner that offenses of colossal magnitude will be regarded as just as worthy of condign punishment as those which are small and mean. [Applause.]

The control of these corporations is a work that has hardly begun in the States of this country. In some they run riot at will. They can be framed to do almost anything, and their management may continue year by year a mystery, not merely to the outside public, but to their stockholders as well. How can this be corrected? By compelling them to expose to the public their methods of transacting business, their receipts, their expenditures. The National Government has set a good example in the national-banking laws, which, while not perfect, are a great advance upon previous banking laws. Much has already been done in the control of the railways. We will be doing more in this bill, and, no doubt, can do more still. And as these great aggregations of capital in an ever-increasing degree conduct their operations beyond State lines, it is proper and in the line of natural development that the Central Government should exercise control.

This is a great country of ours. We have gained a material development, in which the railroads have had much to do, beyond any other country on the globe. Here, between the lesser and the greater oceans, there is a continent in which every valley and every hill, every plain, and every mountain abounds in the wealth of the farm, of the forest, or of the mine. The Macedonian phalanx under Alexander and the Roman legions conquered a portion of the earth which was small in comparison with that far wider area which has yielded to the pacific triumphs of American industry. Our merchants and our manufacturers send argosies carrying their wares to the remotest parts of the globe, and the white sails and the black hulls bring back from Orient and Occident their treasures to lay at our feet. But is this all? Is it not well for us to consider whether a development less rapid, especially a development in which there shall be a greater degree of equality, would not be a better one? Is it not true that the benefits of wealth and increasing prosperity do not bring their best results unless they spread all over the land, bringing blessings to the humblest cottage, bringing plenty to the poor as well as to the rich and to the millionaire? [Applause.]

We should not lay all the blame upon those who have gained these great fortunes. They have been prompted in their course by the superabundant vitality of our industrial and commercial life and spurred on by the admiration of the people. But we can condemn and punish them for wrongdoing. We should labor to secure greater equality of opportunity. And along these lines, whatever defects there may be in this bill, however doubtful it may be whether it will work out as is hoped or not, it is, at any rate, a step in the right direction. It is a declaration of the principle that aggregate wealth must submit to the law. It enforces the idea that no combination can be so strong or so great but that the Government shall place its strong hand upon it to restrain and control its operations. [Applause.] It is a measure which, I trust, will impress upon railway managers a fuller appreciation of the supreme importance to all the people of these great agencies of transportation and cause their business to be so transacted that none shall be discriminated against or oppressed. In this connection I believe there are none who will be more substantially benefited by this measure than the railways themselves, at least those in which the management is honest and straightforward.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to request of the gentleman before he takes his seat, that he give us some of his opinions as to the details of this legislation which he himself has said is so important to look to. Will he answer some of those questions that he requested of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as to the nature of the power that is conferred on the Commission, whether it is legislative or administrative, and how far the courts may review that action? Those questions, I think, are the ones that are puzzling the minds of some of us, and we would certainly like to have them explained by the gentleman, and I ask this in all sincerity.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not feel like treating those questions at any great length, partly because my time is limited and partly because the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, can no doubt answer them a great deal better than I can. Of course it will be taken for granted that the action of the Commission in fixing rates may be submitted for review to some judicial body. In that connection I would say that the very promptest decision should be rendered by the court on such questions. These are not merely cases between A and B—private litigants. The questions presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission affect a very wide area and a multitude of individuals.

The interest of an individual shipper may amount to but little, but the principle or rule established will be of very large importance.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman consider that the court reviewing the action of the Commission in fixing a rate can pass upon the reasonableness of that rate in any other sense than using the word "reasonable" as confiscatory?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I should think not. Absolute confiscation, of course, is not meant, but the fixing of a rate which deprives the railroad of that profit upon its property to which it is entitled under the Constitution and the law.

Mr. SHERLEY. The fixing of one rate would hardly be sufficient to determine whether or not it was going to yield a proper revenue, would it?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It might.

Mr. SHERLEY. It ordinarily would not, it simply being one of hundreds of rates from which the railroad got its revenue.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It might be upon an item of traffic so important and so connected with others that the whole question of the revenue to be derived by the railroad from its traffic would be determined by that single rate.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman's understanding of the power of the court is correct, that it can only review in the sense of deciding whether the rate is confiscatory or not, would it have any value practically unless the Commission's action was one affecting many rates or affecting one fundamental rate?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I am not sure about that. I do not know that I correctly understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. SHERLEY. The making of one rate and the reviewing of one rate will really involve but a small source of the total revenue and have but a small relation to the road's earnings. Now, if the court can only review the action of the Commission in the sense of determining whether its action was unconstitutional and not in the sense of the action being reasonable when the Commission has fixed but one rate, there will be nothing by which ordinarily the court could say that the rate would be confiscatory, because it does not affect enough of the revenue. That is only a suggestion, of course, I am making.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Of course there is no one rate that can be considered independently. Also there might be a specific article, such as coal, carried between specific places, a decision of the Commission upon which would have a very wide-reaching effect.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am asking these questions because I believe in the minds of a great many men, Members of this body, there is no disposition to deny to the Commission a proper power and to remedy the evils that we recognize; but some of us have yet to hear from any Member of this House a decided statement either as to the law or as to the practical working out of the provisions of this bill, and, knowing the gentleman's ability, I have asked him for that sort of an explanation.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I have not had anything to do with the framing of this bill. Members of the committee have already spoken on that subject much better than I can. The evident intention is to leave with this Interstate Commerce Commission a general power, if a rate is found to be unreasonable, to correct it and declare a proper one.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman consider that power relates to differentials?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The Commission has in the past assumed to exercise authority with reference to differentials, as in the illustrations which I have given, and it is fair to presume that such authority is given in this bill. I have said that the policy relating to differentials is a proper subject for legislation. Take the instance of freight intended for shipment abroad as compared with that intended for domestic consumption.

The effect of such a differential might assume such magnitude as to create a question of important national policy.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to ask the gentleman whether he considers that this bill does confer the right? Because the report of the committee says it does not; that the power over differentials is not conferred. What is the gentleman's opinion as a lawyer?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I have not examined it with that degree of care to enable me to express a positive opinion. I should think, however, that it did give that right.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I will simply say that I trust this bill will prove a step in the right direction, and that more and more, by legislation and by an awakened public sentiment, we may alike destroy discrimination and the undue oppressive influence of these great combinations of capital and establish a system of industrial development which shall be characterized by the rules of honesty, of equality, and of law. [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 86. An act for the erection of a monument to the memory of Commodore John Barry;

S. 319. An act to reimburse Abram Johnson, formerly postmaster at Mount Pleasant, Utah;

S. 541. An act for the relief of certain citizens of Montana, claiming the benefit of the homestead laws;

S. 609. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Wyoming;

S. 613. An act repealing an act entitled "An act to extend the time for presenting claims for additional bounties," and its amendments and extensions, so far as they limit the time for presenting claims for additional bounties granted to soldiers by the twelfth and thirteenth sections of the act of July 28, 1866;

S. 927. An act establishing a fog signal at Ediz Hook light station, State of Washington, and for other purposes;

S. 956. An act providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the district of Alaska;

S. 980. An act to ratify an agreement with the Lower Brulé band of the Sioux tribe of Indians in South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect;

S. 983. An act to validate certain certificates of soldiers' additional homestead right;

S. 1031. An act granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State;

S. 1374. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Utah;

S. 1462. An act to establish one or more fish-cultural stations on Puget Sound, State of Washington;

S. 1648. An act for the relief of the Hoffman Engineering and Contracting Company;

S. 2274. An act to establish a fog signal on one of the jetties at the entrance to the harbor at Humboldt Bay, California;

S. 2275. An act to provide for the erection of a keeper's double dwelling at Bonita Point, California;

S. 2277. An act to establish a light-house and fog signal on Red Rock, upper part of San Francisco Bay, California;

S. 2279. An act to establish a light and fog-signal station near Point Cabrillo, California;

S. 2451. An act granting to the State of North Dakota 30,000 acres of land to aid in the maintenance of a school of forestry;

S. 2655. An act to establish a light and fog signal on Karquinez Strait, California;

S. 2656. An act to purchase an additional strip of land to the eastward of the light-house at Pigeon Point, California;

S. 2658. An act to construct a tender for the Light-House Service in Hawaiian and Pacific islands waters;

S. 2700. An act to improve the public building at Newport, R. I.;

S. 2771. An act to establish a light and fog-signal station at or near Southwest Ledge, entrance to New London Harbor, Conn.;

S. 2777. An act for the construction of a suitable vessel for the Revenue-Cutter Service for duty at Savannah, Ga.;

S. 2786. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to purchasers of pine timber on ceded Indian lands sums paid in excess of the correct amounts due for timber cut;

S. 2964. An act for the relief of the L. S. Watson Manufacturing Company, of Leicester, Mass.;

S. 3263. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a port of delivery at Salt Lake City, Utah;"

S. 3409. An act for the construction of an able seagoing tug for the Revenue-Cutter Service for New Bedford, Mass.; and

S. 3416. An act to prohibit any vessel from anchoring in such manner as to obstruct or interfere with the range lights established in any navigable waters of the United States by the United States Light-House Board.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, in 1887, responding to a demand from the people asking for remedial legislation against abuses on the part of the railroads of this country, Congress passed and enacted the present interstate-commerce law, which was approved by the Executive on February 8, 1887. No one questions the fact that that was a step in the right direction and that it is a law that has given relief to the people of the country and at the same time been an advantage and a protection to the railroads.

Subsequently to the passage of the act and at divers times amendments were proposed and adopted perfecting the law—the first one March 12, 1889; another on February 10, 1891, and still another February 8, 1895. Other acts strengthening the law have been enacted, the first one February 11, 1893, and the last one February 19, 1903, known as the "Elkins Act."

When the law was enacted in 1887 it was believed that it contained a provision by which the Commission had the power to fix a reasonable rate after finding that an existing rate was unreasonable. That power was exercised by the Commission and recoginzed by the railroads and the country for a period of ten years. In 1897, in the Maximum Rate case, the Supreme Court said that the Commission did not have that power.

From that time there began to be a clamor and a demand all over this country that the law should be amended so as to give to the Commission the power that it formerly supposed had been conferred when the law was originally enacted.

As time passed on the demand for this additional legislation became greater and greater, until in 1903, in order to check if possible the demand for this particular legislation, the Elkins law, known as the "antirebate law," was enacted, and I will say something about that law a little later.

Mr. Chairman, that act did not have the effect of silencing the clamor and the demand for the legislation which this bill proposes to enact, namely, giving the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, when a rate has been challenged and found to be unreasonable, to fix a reasonable rate as the maximum above which the railroad or the carrier can not charge.

In the third session of the last Congress the President, recognizing the demand for this legislation, recognizing that it was just and honest and right that this power should be vested in the Commission, sent to Congress a message; and upon this subject I want to read what he had to say:

> While I am of the opinion that at present it would be undesirable, if it were not impracticable, finally to clothe the Commission with general authority to fix railroad rates, I do believe that, as a fair security to shippers, the Commission should be vested with the power, where a given rate has been challenged and after full hearing found to be unreasonable, to decide, subject to judicial review, what shall be a reasonable rate to take its place, the ruling of the Commission to take effect immediately, and to obtain unless and until it is reversed by the court of review. The Government must in increasing degree supervise and regulate the workings of the railways engaged in interstate commerce; and such increased supervision is the only alternative to an increase of the present evils on the one hand or a still more radical policy on the other. In my judgment, the most important legislative act now needed as regards the regulation of corporations is this act to confer on the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to revise rates and regulations, the revised rate to at once go into effect, and to stay in effect unless and until the court of review reverses it.

At the same time in his message he referred to corporations in general, and shows the connection between the corporations known as "common carriers" and corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and I will read what he said, but before doing so I want to say that I concur fully in what he states, not only in this message, but also in his message to the present Congress, that there ought to be some kind of Federal supervision or control over all corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and I also hope that some way can soon be devised so that there can be Federal supervision of the great life insurance companies of this country. I will now read that part of the President's message of a year ago to which I have referred:

> Great corporations can become such only by engaging in interstate commerce, and interstate commerce is peculiarly the field of the General Government.
> The National Government alone can deal adequately with these great corporations. To try to deal with them in an intemperate, destructive, or demagogic spirit would in all probability mean that nothing whatever would be accomplished and with absolute certainty that if anything were accomplished it would be of a harmful nature. The American people need to continue to show the very qualities that they have shown—that is, moderation, good sense, the earnest desire to avoid doing any damage, and yet the quiet determination to proceed, step by step, without halt and without hurry, in eliminating or at least in minimizing whatever of mischief or of evil there is to interstate commerce in the conduct of great corporations. They are acting in no spirit of hostility to wealth, either individual or corporate. They are not against the rich man any more than against the poor man. On the contrary, they are friendly alike toward rich man and toward poor man, provided only that each acts in a spirit of justice and decency toward his fellows. Great corporations are necessary, and only men of great and singular mental power can manage such corporations successfully, and such men must have great rewards. But these corporations should be managed with due regard to the interest of the public as a whole. Where this can be done under the present laws it must be done. Where these laws come short others should be enacted to supplement them.

Responding to that message to which I have just referred, and recognizing the demand for this legislation, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of this House in December, 1904, took up the subject as presented by numerous bills that were introduced. Hearings were had covering a period of weeks, the committee meeting almost daily, hearing witnesses on the part of the shippers, on the part of the railroads, and getting information from every source that it could bearing on this subject. It was the short session of Congress, and when the end of the session was approaching it was finally agreed by the majority of the committee that the best that it could do at that time was to accept and report the bill, which it did accept and report, known as the Townsend-Esch bill.

That bill was brought into this House and discussed for many days, passed the House practically unanimous, and, for one, Mr. Chairman, who not only voted for that bill but voted in the committee to report it, I have no apologies to make at this time. Had it not been, Mr. Chairman, for the progress made in the Fifty-eighth Congress we would not be where we are to-day, and while I believe, and in fact I know, that the present measure now under consideration goes much further, deals with questions that that bill did not cover—I say that that bill was, under the circumstances, the best that could be had, and that if we did not have anything better now, this House would practically unanimously accept that bill [applause], the statement of certain gentlemen to the contrary notwithstanding.

The fact that no legislation was had by the last Congress intensified the demand for it. President Roosevelt never faltered or at any time changed his position, and he boldly declared in several speeches during the summer for what he had advocated in his message in December, 1904, and when this Congress convened last December he again recommended, in stronger terms than in his former message, in favor of this legislation, and following his recommendation several bills were introduced on the subject.

Before discussing some provisions of the bill now before the House I want to submit what it proposes to do:

First. That all charges for transportation of property shall be just and reasonable. Every common carrier shall print and keep open to public inspection schedules showing the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers and property, and the schedules shall state separately the terminal charges, icing charges, and all other charges which the Commission may require, and no change shall be made in the rates, fares, and charges which have been established and published by any common carrier except after thirty days' public notice, except that the Commission may, in its discretion and for good cause shown, allow changes upon less than thirty days' notice. Every carrier is required to file with the Interstate Commerce Commission copies of its schedules.

Second. Section 4 proposes to amend section 15 of the interstate-commerce law, and gives to the Commission the power, after fully hearing and upon a complaint, if any of the rates or charges whatsoever demanded, charged, or collected by any carrier are unjust or unreasonable, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged, and also what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed, and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier, and shall remain in force unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

If the owner of property transported directly or indirectly renders any service connected with such transportation or furnishes any instrumentality used therein, the charge and allowance therefor shall be no more than is just and reasonable, and the Commission may determine what is a reasonable charge as the maximum to be charged by the carrier or carriers for the services so rendered or for the use of the instrumentality so furnished.

Third. Any carrier who fails or neglects to obey any order made by the Commission shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $5,000 for each offense, and every distinct violation is declared a separate offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense.

Forfeitures shall be recoverable in a suit in the name of the United States brought in the district where the carrier has its principal operating office or in any district through which the road of the carrier runs, and it shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures.

In case any carrier fails or neglects to obey any order of the Commission the Commission may apply to the court for an order and the court may enforce such order by writ of injunction. From any action either party may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and all appeals shall have priority in hearing and determination over all other cases, except criminal causes, but the appeal shall not vacate or suspend the order appealed therefrom.

Fourth. Section 7 amends section 20 of the present law and requires that all common carriers shall make annual reports to the Commission showing the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipments; the number of employees and the salaries paid each class; the accidents to passengers, employees, and other persons, and the causes thereof; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss; and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts affecting the same as the Commission may require; and the Commission may, in its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, prescribe a period of time within which all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall have, as near as may be, a uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

In case of failure on the part of any carrier to make report within thirty days from the time required so to do, such carrier shall forfeit the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall continue to be in default. The Commission may prescribe the forms of all accounts to be kept by carriers, and the Commission shall, at all times, have access to all accounts, records, etc., kept by carriers, and it may employ such agents or examiners to inspect and examine any and all accounts, records, etc., kept by carriers. Failure or refusal of any carrier to keep accounts in the manner prescribed by the Commission, or to submit such accounts to the inspection of the Commission or its authorized agents or examiners, shall forfeit the sum of $500 for each offense and for each and every day of the continuance of such offense.

Fifth. Section 8 of the bill provides for adding a new section to the present law, and increases the Commission to seven members, with terms of seven years, at an annual salary of $10,000. Provision for appointment is made so that the term of one Commissioner shall expire each year, and not more than four Commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, is substantially in form as suggested by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Instead of making a new law, it proposes to amend the present interstate-commerce act. The Commission, in its nineteenth annual report, suggests as to the form of the legislation as follows:

> The form of the proposed measure, as will appear upon inspection, is an amendment of certain sections of the present statute. This statute was passed in February, 1887, and has been in force since that time. Its provisions have become familiar to the various interests affected by its administration, and several of its sections have been judicially construed. For this and other reasons it is believed that needful changes in the law should be made by specific amendments rather than by the enactment of an independent measure. We are of the opinion that this course would simplify legislation and be more likely to avoid uncertainty of meaning. There appears to be little occasion to alter the general plan and framework of the original act, and it would seem advisable to increase its effectiveness by amending particular sections.

The committee, Mr. Chairman, took that view and accepted the bill which had been prepared by the very distinguished gentleman who has the honor of being chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in this House. Of course, we spent much time in considering and perfecting it, and it was amended in several respects from what it was as originally prepared, but the form was not changed. This bill contains everything that the President has recommended. It contains substantially all that the Interstate Commerce Commission say is necessary. During the last few months the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has given this subject a great deal of study and consideration. He has conferred frequently with the Commission, with the President, with the Department of Justice, and with others possessing information on the subject of this proposed legislation. He happens to have been a Member of this House and a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce when the present interstate-commerce act was reported by that committee and passed this House. As was stated yesterday, he has had large experience, he is wise, and he is learned. He understands this question as no other man can understand it, and now, twenty years after the passage of that act, when he was a member of that committee—now, when he occupies the position of chairman of that committee, I say, it is a fitting tribute to him that any legislation at this time to complete that act, to make it effective as it was originally intended, should bear the name of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, since this legislation was proposed, something over a year ago, the railroads throughout the country, especially at first, became very much exercised and alarmed, and they endeavored to demonstrate that the passage of such a measure would be destructive to their interests and therefore injurious to the material good and best interests of the country.

It is well known, and I do not think any person will dispute it, that they organized a bureau from which was issued great quantities of literature bearing on the subject from their standpoint, which was circulated generally throughout the country covering a period of months; that in many instances newspapers were induced to accept matter prepared by this bureau and publish it, all tending toward supporting their theory, which was that this legislation was destructive and undesirable from every standpoint. Mr. Chairman, the railroad companies have a perfect right, and I am not going to question for a moment their right, to try and prevent this or any other proposed legislation, by legitimate means, if they believe it is harmful to their interests.

Notwithstanding their efforts, notwithstanding the campaign of education on their part, which has been carried on for about a year, there has been no change in the sentiment among the people, and the demand for this legislation to-day is as strong or stronger than it ever has been before. We were told that if this legislation was had the railroads would go into bankruptcy, that there would cease to be development along railroad lines. Why, Mr. Chairman, in the face of this threatened legislation, the past year has been a high-water mark for railroads in this country so far as their gross earnings are concerned. In my own State we have an example of the effect of this threatened legislation. For a period of twenty-five years the railroads from the east into South Dakota have stopped at the Missouri River, the Missouri River dividing the State north and south in about the middle of the State. The people have struggled, they have bonded themselves, they have done everything possible to secure relief from a situation that was anything but desirable.

It was retarding the development and settlement of our State, and therefore, as I have before stated, there has been on the part of the people for twenty-five years a systematic determination if possible to secure additional railroads, and without any result. Now, since the last Congress passed the Townsend-Esch bill, and when we are about to pass the present bill, the two great roads, viz, the Chicago and Northwestern and the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, are building three lines across our State and building bridges across the Missouri River, one of said lines being projected to the Pacific coast, thereby demonstrating that the prophecies of the railroads that the effect of this legislation on the country and on railroad construction would be bad are not being fulfilled, but that notwithstanding this legislation the railroads continue to prosper as they have never prospered before, and the extension of new railroads in the last year, I think, will exceed any year since 1890.

Mr. Chairman, in assisting in perfecting this bill in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and in advocating its passage, I do not do so because I am opposed to railroads, for I have a very high appreciation of their importance and what they represent to the country, and for the purpose of showing the mileage in the country, the value of railroad properties, their gross earnings for the last year, and the number of persons who are employed, I wish to read the following, which is from the Nineteenth Annual Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

STATISTICS OF RAILWAYS—PRELIMINARY REPORT ON THE INCOME AND EXPENDITURES OF RAILWAYS FOR THE YEAR ENDING JUNE 30, 1905.

> The preliminary report for the past fiscal year includes returns received by December 6 for 752 operating companies, representing an operated mileage of 214,477.82 miles, which is presumably about 99 per cent of the mileage that will subsequently be covered by returns in the final report for the same year.
> The gross earnings of the railways for the year ending June 30, 1905, on the mileage already stated were $2,073,177,325. This total comprised earnings from the passenger service amounting to $572,109,366, or 27.60 per cent; earnings from the freight service amounting to $1,449,182,702, or 69.90 per cent, and other miscellaneous earnings amounting to $51,885,257, or 2.50 per cent. According to this preliminary report, the gross earnings from operation averaged $9,666 per mile of line. This average is considerably larger than the like average for any other year for which a statistical report has been published by the Commission.

EMPLOYEES.

The number of persons on the pay rolls of the railways in the United States, as returned for June 30, 1904, was 1,296,121, or 611 per 100 miles of line. These figures, in comparison with those for 1903, show a decrease of 16,416 in the number of employees, or 28 per 100 miles of line. The classification of employees includes enginemen, 52,451; firemen, 55,004; conductors, 39,645; and other trainmen, 106,734. There were 46,262 switch tenders, crossing tenders, and watchmen. The four general divisions of railway employment, it appears, required the services of employees as follows: General administration, 48,746 employees; maintenance of way and structures, 415,721 employees; maintenance of equipment, 261,819 employees; and conducting transportation, 566,798 employees. This statement disregards a few employees not assigned.

The present report continues the customary statement of the average daily compensation of 18 classes of employees for a series of years, and also shows the aggregate amount of compensation paid to more than 99 per cent of the number of employees for a period of seven years, excepting 1903, for which the percentage was a little smaller. The amount of wages and salaries paid to employees, as reported for the year ending June 30, 1904, was $817,598,810.

CAPITALIZATION OF RAILWAY PROPERTY.

The par value of the amount of railway capital outstanding on June 30, 1904, was $13,213,124,679, representing a capitalization of $64,265 per mile for the railways in the United States. Of this capital, stock comprised $6,339,899,329, of which $5,050,529,469 was common stock and $1,289,369,860 was preferred; the remaining part, $6,873,225,350, was funded debt, consisting of mortgage bonds, $5,746,898,983; miscellaneous obligations, $723,114,986; income bonds, $229,876,687; and equipment trust obligations, $173,334,694. Current liabilities, which, as a general statement, have relation to the operation rather than the construction and equipment of a road, for the year 1904 amounted to $881,628,720, or $4,288 per mile of line.

It will be observed from the foregoing statement that the gross earnings of railways in this country for the year ending June 30, 1905, are larger than for any other year for which a statistical report has been published by the Commission.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in relation to this bill that I do not think has been mentioned by anyone else thus far, and that is that I hope the House will accept the bill as reported by the committee. I want to say to those that honestly hope for legislation, that are the friends of this legislation, that they should stand by the bill as unanimously reported by the committee, rather than endanger it by amendments offered promiscuously by different members of the House, as will likely be the case. You should let this bill pass the House as it came from the committee; not only that by amending it might endanger the benefits that we hope to get from the measure, but having a unanimous report, it should go through the House as it is; for that is something, I think, if it is not the exception, is very unusual, to have a measure involving a great economic question come from the committee with a unanimous report of the majority and the minority. Its passage promptly through the House will not only have a good effect generally throughout the country, but it may possibly have an effect on some other body that may have to do with it after it leaves this House.

Yesterday we all had the pleasure of listening to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY]. We were all edified and entertained by what he had to say. We all respected and admired him for his boldness and for his frankness in opposing this very popular measure. I presume there is no other Member of this body who enjoys the friendship, the love and affection and good will of his fellow-Members, as does the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is a source of regret to every Member that he has announced his determination to separate himself from the House and that he does not expect after the expiration of his present term to return. When I came to Congress he occupied a seat on the other side of the Chamber. In the following Congress he was returned, but in the meantime he had seen the light, and when he came back he took his seat on this side of the Chamber. He therefore has had the benefit of association on that side, and when he got tired over there he came over here, and it would seem, Mr. Chairman, that he of all Members at this particular time ought to at least agree with one side of the House, but he states that he can not agree with either, and therefore he is opposed to the bill. He says that the Townsend bill, which passed this House a year ago, if it was up for consideration at this time, would not receive two votes.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to challenge that statement and to reiterate what I have already said, that if that bill was pending now, and it was the best thing that we could get on this subject, we would do substantially what we did in the last Congress, and that is to pass it practically unanimously. He says that if this bill had been up for consideration before this House two years ago it would not have received 10 votes. Why, Mr. Chairman, this proposition was up for consideration in this House about thirty years ago. It was discussed in the House during a period of about ten years at intervals, particularly in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, when, in 1887, was passed the present interstate-commerce act, which it was believed contained the legislation that is proposed here, so far as conferring the limited rate-making power is concerned. So if it is socialistic now to consider this legislation, it was socialistic twenty years ago. Why talk about socialism? Somebody might very properly ask what is anarchy. If it were not for the fact that the railroads have disobeyed the law we would not at this time be called upon to legislate compelling them to observe the law.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] assumed a false premise. He assumed that this was a propostion of Government ownership. I listened with much interest to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] yesterday, and if this bill were so amended as to embody the ideas as proposed by him, then, possibly to some extent, the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be pertinent and in point. But I say, Mr. Chairman, that this bill does not propose Government ownership. It is not a step toward Government ownership. As it has been stated before, it is a step away from Government ownership, for just as sure as we do not get this legislation, or something very closely akin to it, then just as sure as anything can be it is only a matter of time when possibly there may be legislation that will go to an extreme and go away beyond what any person would wish for or want to see happen. The gentleman yesterday spoke of socialism because we were proposing legislation to regulate the common carriers of this country. In the opening part of his speech he took the position, substantially, that we did not have the right to enact this legislation, that it was an interference with private property rights. I do not know that he went quite that far, but there are gentlemen in this House that I have heard say that we have no more right to legislate as we propose here than we have the right to legislate what a man who might own a house should charge for the rental of the house, to say what improvements he might make, to say what taxes he should pay, and when he should pay them.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that any person will seriously contend that the subject of dealing with the common carriers of the country and their regulation can be considered for a moment as private interests. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania finished he practically indorsed every word in this bill with the one exception of the power to clothe the Commission with the right to make a rate after finding a rate complained of unreasonable. The gentleman said, on the subject of rebates, that if there were rebates being practiced now it was because some officer charged with a duty of seeing that the law was enforced was not discharging that duty. Mr. Chairman, the report of the Commission, all of the evidence upon this subject of rebates, shows that rebates are being indulged in quite generally throughout the country without any violation of the Elkins Act whatever by means of practices or instrumentalities, such as refrigerator cars, icing charges, elevator charges, terminal and side-track facilities, that rebates are given that are in fact rebates just as if the Elkins law had never been enacted. This bill makes it impossible for those practices to be continued if it should become a law. Why, the gentleman said that he would make a fine, I think, of a hundred thousand dollars for a carrier to give or any person to receive a rebate. Why, apply his argument in the early part of his speech; he would not have any legislation at all governing or regulating the railroads of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I want to impress a little further upon the House the hope that this bill will be accepted as it has come from the committee. As I have before stated, it contains everything that has been asked for by the President and by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has been framed after great care and great study on the part not only of the committee, but others who have been making a study of this subject. Mr. Chairman, I have heard it stated by some that they were for this bill because it was a step toward Government ownership. I have heard others say that they were in favor of this legislation because it is a step away from Government ownership. Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself, I want to say that I am for this bill because I believe it is honest, because I believe it is right, because I believe that Congress twenty years ago thought they had conveyed to the Commission the power that is sought to be given by this bill. It not only gives that power, but it goes further, and regulates many abuses that are now being indulged in by the railroads, and will, I think, make, with existing laws, a law that will be all that is necessary for many years to come; a law that will be not only fair to the railroads but do justice to those who have to do business with the railroads. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour and twenty minutes, to be charged equally to the two sides, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] is recognized for one hour and twenty minutes.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, if the pending bill made an effective response to public opinion upon the railroad question, it would deal in the most comprehensive and the most particular terms with rebates or favored rates, whether given directly or in any of the indirect forms in which they have been extended. A secret rate lower than the rate which is published for all or valuable concessions given shippers, under whatever subterfuge, are obnoxious to the law, which contemplates not merely a just and reasonable but an equal rate. What is demanded to meet the real evil, and what was demanded by public opinion until its attention was diverted to an utterly irrational and haphazard remedy, is legislation making clear beyond question the right of every man to equal treatment and giving him the amplest remedy for every violation of his right. The private car, refrigerator car, the industrial switch, receiving a part of the through rate as if it were an independent line, every instrument of favoritism and injustice, had justly received public condemnation. These evils were dealt with in general terms by the amendment known as the "Elkins Act." But that act needed to be broadened; it needed to be made more specific, so that it should prohibit unequal treatment under whatever guise, and then it needed to be enforced, not merely by a fine, but in clear cases of evasion by imprisonment both for the giver and the receiver of the secret rate. If a law had been passed upon these lines one year ago, every demand of what can justly be called "public sentiment" would have been satisfied. The Republican national convention in 1904 made no declaration whatever regarding railroads. The Democratic convention declared against rebates and discrimination. Rebates and discriminations in all their protean forms were the real evil. The President in his annual message declared against them, but he promulgated as a remedy that the Commission be given authority to fix railroad rates whenever a complaint should be made.

The leading authority upon railroad economics in the British Empire said, not long ago, of the bill passed by the House last winter in line with the President's recommendation, that it would have done no more to stop rebates than would the reenactment of Magna Charta. I endeavored to point out at that time upon this floor that there was no possible relation between the giving of rebates and the fixing of rates by a commission, and that a railroad could as easily give a criminal rebate from a rate fixed by a commission as from one fixed by itself. And the advocates of this legislation have refrained from penetrating the awful mystery and have discreetly permitted the relation between rebates and commission rate making to remain a secret until this day.

The issue of political rate making in the Congress of the United States is not the result of any evolution or of any expression of public opinion, but it is a mere fungus growth. It sprung up in a night. It grew out of the Presidential non sequitur, and I am very willing to concede that a non sequitur is something in which a busy man may sometimes indulge. If teachers of logic are looking for a perfect example of a non sequitur for their classes, I commend them to the statement of the evils and the statement of the remedy contained in the President's annual message to Congress in December, 1904.

And at once political rate fixing became a burning issue—I mean in Congress, but not before the people, for there has been no election since it was so suddenly and so illogically sprung upon the country. Mr. Bryan, the once idolized leader of his party, for a time dethroned, but summoned back again by the overwhelming exodus of Silver Democrats at the last election, Mr. Bryan, who might have brought action for infringement, generously hailed political rate making as a decisive step toward his cherished dogma, Government ownership, and he fixed upon it the stamp of his emphatic approbation. He looked upon it as his own child, and not long ago, as he was starting around the globe, in almost the last words he uttered upon American soil, with a paternal solicitude he commended the bantling to the tender care of the President.

The Democratic party followed its leader and took up the cause of rate making with enthusiasm and unanimity. As for the Republicans, rate fixing had been made party policy by our just elected President, and, logic or no logic, we were expected to get in line. This is the genesis of the public opinion upon this point. If any political platform adopted prior to the President's message by either of the great parties suggested any form of rate making by the National Government as a remedy for discrimination or for any other purpose, I trust some gentleman will cite it.

So far as favoritism is concerned, in every one of its forms I am opposed to it. I would have you enact against it the most drastic law which ingenuity could devise. And I would have the right of every man to a just, reasonable, and equal rate taken to the courts at the expense of the Government, in the first instance, and ultimately of the railroads, if they were held to be in the wrong, under every effective species of remedy, taken to that forum where Anglo-Saxon freedom has won its noblest triumphs. For my part I prefer the natural and beneficent liberty of the courts to the cast-iron regulations of a commission. I would encourage proceedings such as that in Scotland, which, for a differential given in good faith, took from a railroad company in damages and costs about $700,000. But in this measure we are neglecting to follow the vital line and paltering with the highest interests of the country. I am for every feature of your bill aimed at discrimination, and I would favor far more stringent features; but your rate fixing, which is the substantial part of your bill, is economically as vicious as it is illogical and I propose to submit to you some reasons why I can not give my support to a measure which I fear you have already almost unanimously determined to enact.

And I shall at the outset dispose of two or three preliminary propositions. It is claimed that it was intended to confer the rate-making power when the interstate act was passed, and that the Commission for ten years exercised it. The facts are that the framers of the act declared in the debate that it did not confer the rate-making power; the courts as early as 1890 decided that the power did not exist; there was no general belief that it had been conferred, and although the Commission assumed to pass on the relative reasonableness of rates in a few cases, when it attempted to exercise the power in a really important case, its authority was challenged, and the Supreme Court finally decided that the act did not confer the power of fixing a rate.

Of the same character as the misapprehension which I have referred to is the pretense that the rate-fixing power in this bill is altogether exceptional in its character—not for every-day use, but likely only to be exercised upon rare and great occasions. Gentlemen simply run away from their proposition, and it is little cause for wonder. Their bill confers the power to revise all the rates in the country and to substitute other rates for them upon the happening of a mere formality. In the maximum-rate case thousands of rates were involved, and there is the testimony of a high officer of one of the railroads concerned that the reduction ordered by the Commission in that case would have cost the railroads $3,000,000 a year. It would have meant bankruptcy to some of the railroads. But if you need a decision of a court upon so plain a proposition, read what the Supreme Court said when it passed upon the asserted power which is similar to that granted in your bill:

If—

Said the court, in 167 United States, 510—

the power existed as is claimed there would be no escape from the conclusion that it would be within the discretion of the Commission, of its own motion, to suggest that all the interstate rates on all roads of the country were unjust and unreasonable, notify the several roads of such opinion, direct a hearing, and upon such hearing make one general order reaching to every road and covering every rate.

It is clear that the present bill gives the Commission, upon the mere formality of somebody's filing a complaint, power to set aside great groups of rates and to substitute other rates for them. The pretense that it contemplates only the challenging here and there of a single rate demonstrates clearly that the advocates of this measure do not understand it or that they do not dare avow its purpose. On the theory that a mere isolated rate is to be tried here and there your bill amounts to nothing from your own standpoint, for, as was said by a railroad president the other day, it would take hundreds of years for your court to sit in judgment upon each of the billion or more rates in the country. Indeed, the new rates would increase faster than your Commission could decide them. I shall therefore assume that this measure is a rate-fixing scheme of the most sweeping character.

The fundamental question, then, involved is, Do we want rate making by a Government board? The burden of proof rests upon the man who contends that such a system should be substituted for the system at present in force. It is upon the advocates of this bill to show that we should set aside the American system of fixing freight rates which has given us rates hardly half as high as are paid by the other great countries of the world, although our railroads pay their labor twice the wages paid in the other countries. The burden of proof, I say, rests heavily upon those who would radically substitute for our present system the foreign system of fixing rates by the Government. Magnificent platitudes about eminent domain and our duty to exercise the great commerce powers of the Constitution will not sustain the burden. Give us a reason why we should discard a system which has been a success for a system which has been a failure.

The experiment has been thoroughly tried. We have the result of the experience of other nations and of our own. You will find the experience of the great countries of the world admirably set forth in a book by Professor Meyer upon Government Regulation of Rates. If Professor Meyer is wrong in any of his important statements, I have not observed that those who differ with him have pointed out his errors. And my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], in his masterly speech yesterday, left little to be said upon this point.

Take first the experience of Germany, which for more than a quarter of a century has had rates fixed by the Government. In the case of Germany, however, the Government owns the railroads and has all the rights which go with the proprietor and also with the state. The state is simply managing its own property and manfully paying the bills. In that country the rates were made upon a mileage basis, and this difficulty was at once encountered. If the rates were high enough per mile so that traffic hauled for a short distance would yield a net revenue, they would be so high for a long haul as to be practically prohibitive of long-distance traffic; and on the other hand, if the mileage rate were so low that merchandize could be carried a great distance profitably, the short-distance traffic would be carried at a loss. The German Government made repeated attempts to give concessions from the mileage rate in favor of long-distance traffic. For instance, it made the so-called "tapering rate," that would permit the wheat of eastern Germany to find its way by rail to the great manufacturing centers along the Rhine. Saxony, in the center of Germany, also produces wheat, and the Saxon millers and landowners contended that they had a "natural right" to the market in their neighborhood, and that it was a discrimination for the Government to bring the wheat of eastern Germany at an exceptionally low rate to western Germany in competition with the wheat and flour of Saxony. The German Government is a reasonably autocratic Government, and yet, resist as it would, it was finally compelled to yield and to reestablish the mileage rate upon the eastern wheat; and the German minister declared that 125 miles was the maximum distance at which wheat could be carried by rail in Germany for domestic consumption. The same minister said that for most purposes of trade eastern Germany and the Rhine country were farther apart than Germany and New York or Germany and Buenos Ayres.

The same thing was illustrated in the raising of sugar. At the time of the sugar campaign there is a great demand for labor in the sugar-producing sections, and the state railroads would sell excursion tickets to the laborer for less than the regular rates; but the landowners of other portions of Germany claimed that these special rates had the result of inducing the labor, which they would naturally employ, to leave them unless they paid higher wages—in effect these landowners claimed that the excursion tickets operated to take away from them their natural rights—and although it was admitted that the laborer secured higher wages and these wages resulted in a better standard of living and that the travel which the workingmen got broadened to an extent their intellectual horizon, yet the Government finally yielded and stopped the practice of selling excursion tickets and restored the hard and rigid state rate.

This insistence upon the right to a market which proximity gives, this resistence to discrimination and favoritism shown by hauling at a low rate the merchandize of a community at a great distance so that it may compete in the same market with the near-by community, is also seen in the manufacture of iron and steel. And the effect of the recognition of the natural-right theory, the mileage theory, in Germany, resisted in vain by that Government, has been undeniably toward establishing a zone system of commerce, toward preventing Germany from becoming a common market, and to break it up into little principalities for the purposes of trade. And it is most striking and significant that the German Government, in order to escape from the consequences following its own exercise of the rate-making power upon railroads, expended millions of dollars upon canals connecting its rivers so that traffic might be conducted by private parties between remote parts of the Empire.

Waterways are to-day the vital currents of German trade, although wherever railroads are permitted to compete with water they secure the bulk of the traffic. This is proven by the vastly greater tonnage of export coal carried by railroad than by the Rhine. Traffic upon the railroads along the Elbe greatly exceeded the traffic upon that river, but after the Government assumed control the situation was reversed. The German Government therefore has expended vast sums of money in order to confer upon private parties the power to fix under the operation of natural laws the rates for long-distance traffic. There could not be a more striking example of the evils of government rate fixing than is afforded by the experience of that great and highly civilized country.

In France the rates are made by the Government, not by a political commission of seven men, as the bill before the House would result ultimately in establishing for this country, but by a bureau of thirty-three highly trained experts with a great staff of assistants, although France has barely a tenth of the mileage of the United States. The Government of France has a very large financial investment in its railroads and, as in Germany, it exercises to quite an extent the functions of proprietor as well as the regulating power of the nation when it fixes rates. You will find a similar condition in France to that which exists in Germany. The natural waterways, supplemented by canals built by the state, are the props which chiefly support industrial France. And you will find, as I have said, in both France and Germany freight rates at least twice on the average what they are in America, although the great item in the operation of the railroad, the wages paid the workingmen, are on a scale less than half what the American railroads pay.

The French experts find it necessary to deviate from their ordinary rates, and in a single year 80 per cent of the traffic was carried at special rates. What would be the effect upon public opinion in this country if our national railroad Commission should yield to fair economic demands and permit, if they could do so under this bill, such a deviation from the regular rates?

In England the railroads are not owned by the nation, and the Government, with the conservatism toward private property which characterizes the British people, permits great latitude to the railroads, and they approach in cheapness of service and efficiency the railroads of the United States, although their rate is much higher and their average wage is much lower than in this country. In England, however, the Government established parliamentary rates which, as Mr. Ackworth says, were obsolete almost before they were enacted. They were maximum rates such as you propose to have created under this bill. The tendency has been for the railroads to adhere to the maximum rate or to approach it closely. The establishment of rates materially lower would be a confession that the maximum rates were unreasonably high and might lead to action by the Government reducing the maximum rate. In all of these countries we see a rigidity to the rates established by the Government, and we see, too, the lack of constant supervision of detail, due to the enormous task of revising the great mass of rates, and a lack of responsiveness to the temporary conditions of business which an army of traffic agents, scattered over the country at the sources of freight supply, would keep in touch with and fully recognize in the making of rates.

The Governments of Austria-Hungary and Russia absolutely fix their railroad rates, and substantially the same results are witnessed there as in Germany, only in a more exaggerated form. I have not alluded to Canada because its rate system has been in operation only a year, and so short an experience would be of little value. But even in that short time the commission have begun to readjust rates from the standpoint of distance and to operate as a protective tariff, and they have succeeded in classifying beans, which are carried in small quantities, with wheat which moves in train loads.

The experience of Australia, where the railroads are controlled by the government, is valuable. Her railroads are everything that the people of this country would not desire. Their operation throws a striking light upon one of the favorite theories of our own Commission—a theory that is entirely natural and would have been effective had the Supreme Court not intervened, and which would be effective under this bill.

Our railroads have made certain points, scattered all over the country, what are termed "basing points," and have given them a special rate slightly better than that to the communities immediately about them. This system results in building up centers of trade and distribution at different points in the country, and it results also in giving the localities around these centers lower freight rates, notwithstanding the claim that they are discriminated against, because it enables the railroads to consolidate their freight and haul it from the seaboard or other sources of supply to the center of distribution at greatly less expense, in perhaps 2,000-ton train loads. The Australian system is hostile to the basing point because it adopts to an extent a mileage rate, as our Commission would be compelled to do, and what is the result? A road is built, say from Melbourne 100 miles into the interior, and at its terminus a town springs up which becomes a center for supplying the country about it and the still farther interior. But the road is afterwards extended, and the manufacturer or the jobber in the once flourishing interior town is obviously at a disadvantage with his competitor at Melbourne, because he has a freight rate from Melbourne and another freight rate when he ships his goods to the buyer. He must either retire from business or go to Melbourne, and the result is that the commercial and banking and great industrial business of Australia is done at the four or five ocean termini of the railroads. The freight trains from the seaboard centers peddle out small parcels of freight at a great number of points, and such distribution is enormously expensive.

The destruction of "basing points," so called, in the United States, would take away a great part of the business of Atlanta, Memphis, and Kansas City, and scores of other interior centers, and would transfer it to New York and Chicago and St. Louis. If you think our industry and trade should be centralized in a few great cities instead of being diffused throughout the States of the Union, then you will support this bill, because, if it permits the adjustment of relative rates, it is an admirable instrument to accomplish that purpose.

Then first-class passenger fares are lower in this country than in Europe, but if one travels third or fourth class he may sometimes travel more cheaply abroad than first-class here, and in Germany one may save by traveling fourth-class in a box car on a slow train. But if one traveled on a corresponding scale of luxury in the United States he would bill himself through and go as freight.

Now, what is the American system which, without any consideration worthy of a great economic subject and upon mere generalities, you are airily proposing in this bill to set aside for the policy which I have been describing? In this country the interstate rates have been made by the railroads with practically no check, so far as governmental interference is concerned. It has been the prime policy of the railroads to develop a vast continental traffic drawn at low rates and between the most remote sections of the country. It has been to make of America a common market. The "natural-right" theory has more than once been involved. The low long-distance rates brought the agricultural products of the West in competition with the farms of New York, New England, and Pennsylvania, in markets which, on the "natural-right" theory, belonged to the farmers of the last-named States. And while your lands have gone up enormously in value the farms of New England and the East have greatly decreased in value. Yet on the whole the East has benefited because it concentrated its energies upon manufactures and trade and the railroads took its products to the West at low rates in the cars which bore your produce East, and which would otherwise have returned empty.

If we had had since 1865 a railroad commission with the power in this bill to fix railroad rates it is a moral certainty that many now civilized portions of the West would be unsettled regions, and as a necessary consequence your great cities would not be the magnificent affairs they are to-day. The East, relatively powerful, would have resisted the invasion upon its natural markets by the low long-distance rates, with the inevitable result that has been witnessed in Germany. There would have been a distance tariff, and a distance tariff would have held back the settlement of the far western lands for generations.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has more than once affirmed the "natural-right" theory, and if it is to pass upon the conflicting claims of sections it can not escape from that theory. The elevator and dock owners and great merchants of New York protested against a rate from the West to New York on wheat destined for export lower than the rate to that city on wheat for internal consumption. The low rate for the export wheat was directly for the benefit of the farmer, but it took from the men of New York certain profits that they claimed the "natural right" to have, because their city was the gateway to the Continent, and the Interstate Commerce Commission ordered that the rate on the wheat destined for export should be the same as that for New York. The question involved was of vital importance to the farmer, and it is significant that the railroads were fighting his battle, which the Commission decided against him in effect upon the natural-right theory. The Supreme Court supported the railroads and overturned the decision of the Commission.

The striking feature in the American railroad system, then, has been the remarkable development of the low long-distance rate which has made of the country a common market and has stimulated trade between its most remote parts. The American railroad rates, in the mass, are not the arbitrary fiat rates such as would be ground out by a governmental machine, but, in a sense, they are self-made rates, and result from the free play of commercial and industrial forces. Even such a differential as that established in favor of Baltimore and Philadelphia against New York and Boston, which would at first sight appear artificial, was the result of one of the fiercest and most expensive commercial wars ever waged upon this continent, and when a few months ago the Interstate Commission was called upon to arbitrate, under an agreement between the cities, as to this differential it reached the very conclusion that was the outcome of that war.

The enormous expansion following the civil war was succeeded by the severe financial crisis of 1873, and for a half dozen years the country was in the gloom of a profound depression. There were armies of unemployed in the factory cities of the East, vast numbers of immigrants seeking employment who had poured into the country during the years of its apparent prosperity. Our industrial collapse would have been even more serious and profound had it not been for the policy of our railroads. New lines had been opened up through rich areas, inhabited only by the buffalo and the wolf. But in spite of the fact that the price of wheat had fallen 30 per cent, the railroads established such low rates to the seaboard that the lands were quickly put under the plow, and a great portion of the surplus population of the East was transferred to the farms of the West. Nearly the entire wheat crop of some of the States beyond the Mississippi found a market on the other side of the Atlantic. Mr. Edward Atkinson, as exact an economic authority as ever lived in America, estimated that the saving upon the transportation of wheat from the Mississippi to the Atlantic during the fourteen years succeeding 1873 amounted to 33 cents on every bushel. Suppose we had had a governmental commission at that time, when the East was politically the strongest section and held the dominant power. Is it not almost a certainty that they would have listened to the protest of the latter section against the disturbance of their domestic market in those depressed times, and that those now mighty and stable Commonwealths that lie beyond the Mississippi would have waited for that great development which the railroads forced upon them? Why, those great States are the very daughters of the economic American system of making freight rates. They would not have come into being under the system established by this bill, and yet they are now blindly clasping hands to strangle the mother who bore them. The working of natural laws and the unhampered genius of the enterprising American railroad men proved during that great crisis the salvation of the country.

The rate making of our railroads is done by an army of tens of thousands of men, picketing every part of the country. Often cars have to be returned empty over a long route. A rate that would pay the difference between hauling a car loaded and hauling it empty in such a case would pay the railroad. The traffic agent will often discover a commodity of low value in one part of the country that can be used in another part, and which, unless carried at a very low freight charge, can not be carried at all. The transportation will pay the owner of the commodity something; it will also pay the railroad, and the commodity will be used to advantage by a distant consumer. That traffic would be at once set in motion. The nicest curve, the strain of a swift train upon a bridge, the building of tunnels, can present no more technical questions to the engineer than are often faced by the thousands of traffic men who, in their eager search for tonnage, must consider rival markets and the relative demands of localities.

The flexibility of this system, where rates are fixed by economic laws, is infinitely preferable to the wooden system established by this bill, where, after a rate has been determined, you walk off and leave it a fixed and immutable fact for three years, unless a decree can be obtained from an overworked Commission changing its decision and establishing a new rate. And by the time the authority would be conferred the necessity for a change of rate would probably have passed away.

The editor of the London Statist, perhaps the leading financial organ of the British Empire, in writing recently of a typical report—that of the American Great Northern Railroad—said the results shown in that report would fill the shippers of Great Britain with envy, in which country he declares that, notwithstanding the density of traffic, the people under tariffs directed by government have had very little reduction in a quarter of a century.

Gentlemen talk of throttled competition. You must remember that the most effective competition is not between two or more parallel railroads serving the same points, but between railroads connecting different sources of supply with the same market. The competition between markets has done more to reduce freight rates permanently in this country than the competition between parallel roads, including the injurious and spasmodic "cutting" in rate wars. The rates from Chicago to New York compete with the rates from Chicago to New Orleans and, it may be, with the rates from Chicago to the Pacific. The lines from St. Paul to New York or Boston run in opposition to the steamships plying between South America and London or with the railroads that carry the wheat of interior Russia to the sea. The primary instinct of self-preservation will inspire railroads to protect the markets of the territory they serve. Every interest of private property impels them not merely to preserve, but to build up their communities. But here you propose to have a governmental agency step in and set aside the primary edicts of commerce and trade. It may be for this agency to say not that the railroad shall serve its own interests by serving the interests of its territory, but to say that the natural advantages of its community are not equal to those of a competing community a thousand miles distant served by another railroad, and that the latter community should have a relatively better rate. And it will doubtless be claimed that it has the power, in order to prevent what may be called discrimination between communities to readjust the rates.

Suppose the farmers of Vermont should contend before the Commission that they were only 200 miles from Boston, and that it was a destruction of their natural market for the agricultural products of the West to be brought 1,000 miles into Boston as cheaply as their own produce, and that their rate to Boston should be relatively reduced. What will your Government commission say to that? Or, suppose some iron-manufacturing locality in Pennsylvania should assert that the low rates on coal and pig iron to Worcester, in New England, was a discrimination against the rights of the former locality, what will your railroad commission say to that? It is inevitable that sooner or later, struggle as you may, you will repeat the experience of Germany and have a distance tariff. Mr. Ackworth, the leading English authority, speaking fifteen years ago of the effect of low rates to bring distant markets together and of the inevitable tendency of government rates to become distance rates, said if anyone "wishes to put an end to this state of things and to return as near as may be to the age of gold, when the Middlesex farmers had in the London cattle market the full advantage of their geographical position, he can not do better than devote his energies to securing a government control of railway rates." There is no reason why you gentlemen from the South and West should not have the mileage basis if you want it, but I shall do what I can—I fear much too little—to make you see just what you are voting for. If you want sooner or later to put an effective brake upon our progress, you will find no better way to do it than to vote for the policy upon which the pending bill embarks the country.

Then, the port-preference clause of the Constitution would prohibit the Commission from giving one port an arbitrary differential rate better than another port. Do away with these differentials and you strike a mortal wound at competition.

I have not understood that a popular government was adapted to carrying on to advantage, even on its own account, a business ordinarily conducted by private enterprise. From the time when the Pilgrims saved themselves from starvation only by abandoning the practice of raising corn in common and permitting each family to raise its own corn to the time when Massachusetts built the Hoosac Tunnel for about thirty millions, which it afterwards sold for ten millions, or when Illinois completely bankrupted itself in building railroads and canals and conducting the banking business, the experiments of government on this continent in running business enterprises have uniformly been attended with great waste, if not uniformly with failure. But what may not be expected when a governmental agency manages business for which private individuals pay the bills? The pending measure not merely confers upon a commission the power of establishing a rate, but it makes them in important particulars general managers of the railroads.

It confers upon them authority to prescribe just and fair and reasonable regulations or practices in respect to transportation. It attempts to give them both judicial and legislative powers, making them now a little congress and now a little court, for the Supreme Court has held that it is for the judiciary to say what is a reasonable rate and for the legislature to prescribe what a future rate shall be. The latter is the least of the legislative powers conferred. The Commission may by an order destroy the prosperity of a section of the country and may, in effect, impose restrictions upon commerce between States which it was the prime purpose of the Constitution to prevent. With the Government fixing rates, constituencies would inevitably carry their grievances into politics. I believe it will be contended that your bill in substance confers the power to impose a rate for one section in its relation to the rate of another section. You will therefore have the different parts of the country knocking at the door of the National Government for favors, and intrigue and politics will rekindle the sectional jealousies that have now been happily allayed. This policy will again plant the seeds of discord in the hearts of the American people.

The railroads are not even permitted by this bill to give excursion rates between interstate points without first publishing a schedule thirty days in advance, or unless the Commission makes a special dispensation or a general regulation permitting it. If that does not make a legislature of the Commission, then the hitherto accepted notions of the function of legislation will need to be radically revised. The "Be it enacted by the Philippine Commission," which gives vitality to the laws of a people who are neither a citizen nor a foreign people, will be matched by the "Be it enacted by the Interstate Commerce Commission" in laws passed for the government of the people of the United States. If the making of railroad rates is a legislative function which can be delegated by calling it administrative, why may we not in a bill originating in the House confer upon a commission the power to fix tariff rates?

You propose to confer upon a mere human agency a practical task that would be superhuman. It is made their duty upon complaint to revise any and all the thousand millions or more freight rates in the country and an untold number of passenger rates. In addition to administrative functions, in defiance of the Constitution, you confer upon them, as I have said, judicial and legislative powers. They are to be vested with authority over a dozen billions of property and nearly a million and a half of employees. The enormous magnitude of the task is admitted, but there is to be an easy solution for it all.

We are to have a Commission made up of prodigies and paid splendid salaries. The President, at Austin, Tex., last April, before the two houses of the Texas legislature, gave his notion—and a lofty one it was—of the character of the men who should constitute the Commission. "They should not," he said, "be swayed by any influence whatever—social, political, or any other—to show improper favoritism to the railroads," and, "on the other hand, if the rate is unjustly attacked, no matter if that attack has behind it the feeling or prejudice of 99 per cent of the people," they will stand up against that attack. This is a noble ideal, but where are these paragons to be found? Even far higher officers than commissioners are not always found to be unresponsive to public sentiment. The President has undoubtedly selected for the commissions he has already filled the men whom he believed the best adapted to the work. Nearly all the members of the present Commerce Commission were appointed by him, and yet the Administration bill introduced in the House a year ago proposed to abolish this Commission absolutely. The first Canal Commission were paid magnificent salaries, and yet they were unceremoniously deposed from office in scarcely a year after the President had appointed them. And the present Canal Commission, even with the aid of the $10,000 press agent, does not seem to command the admiring approval of the country. [Applause.] The President will be compelled to discover a new field if he finds the remarkable men that he undoubtedly desires to appoint. But, even if he should find them, he can not endow them with immortality, and some day another President will appoint their successors, provided the Board should not be abolished beforehand, and these successors may be made of common official clay. For my part, I doubt that you will get a better Commission than the one you now have. I have known the New England member from boyhood. He is a brilliant lawyer, and one whom it is not possible to corrupt. The chairman is an able and fair-minded man. The other members command the respect of the people who know them.

But the difficulty will be not so much with the men as with the system. They will be unable to perform those impossible duties, and then their work is near the political line, across which they will inevitably drift, and, as has been attempted already in some of the most enlightened States in the Union, some day, acting under pressure or under the spur of ambition or of a desire to "do things," some great schedule is liable to be broken into atoms, and the commerce and industry of one section may be arbitrarily transferred to another. I believe that it is vastly better for the interests of the country, so long as rates can be fixed under the operation of economic laws, to reject the artificial method proposed by this bill, which makes of a commission a sort of Providence with power to create one city and destroy another.

It is an extraordinary power—the power to fix railroad rates. It might be so exercised as to act as a tariff between States; to strike down trade between remote sections of the country; to dissipate the foreign and domestic commerce of New York; to cause the great city of Chicago, like many another exhalation, to sink back again in the marshes from which she sprang. And yet gentlemen contend that this power is so unimportant that we can call it "administrative" and delegate it.

As representing some of the people of New England upon this floor, I say to you that I believe they do not care to offer up supplications to any statutory deity at Washington for the right to continue to exist, but that they will bravely take their chances with those economic forces which, with a disastrous exception, have hitherto ruled. Having seen her commerce swept from the seas by the action of the national Government in imposing an utterly useless and unstatesmanlike embargo, New England can more safely reckon with the constant or slowly changing economic forces than to have her domestic commerce subject to the "theories of progress" of a commission, possibly of martinets and almost certainly of politicians. The prosperity of her people is vital to the existence of the great railroads which now serve them, but if that should be entirely disregarded, if the railroads should attempt to destroy themselves by destroying the communities which support them, the people of New England still have the courts, and if you will perfect their remedies the dangers that they will be under in even the extreme case I have supposed will be less than the dangers you are creating by the policy of this bill.

Economic writers divide American railroad commissions into two classes—the strong and the weak. The strong ones are those bristling with formidable legal powers and the weak ones have commonly powers of investigating and reporting facts and making recommendations. Mr. Charles Francis Adams, an admirable authority, says the strong commission means "the constable" and the weak one "public opinion." The difference in the effect upon its possessor of the authority to advise and the authority to command is strikingly illustrated by the so-called "strong" and "weak" commissions. The strong commissions, as a rule, are in antagonism with the railroads and often also with the courts which are compelled to intervene to set aside decrees essentially confiscatory. The weak commissions, having the power only to advise, base their advice upon rational and reasonable grounds. The best illustration of the weak commission is that of Massachusetts. Its power regarding rates is purely advisory. When a complaint is made, it investigates and reports, advising the rate which it deems reasonable, and I believe in every instance in the history of the commission its advice has been accepted by the railroads. I venture to say that the Massachusetts commission has done as much for the development of the railroad system and for the protection of its public as any State commission in the Union.

If you are seeking a model for a national commission, I do not know of a better model. The national commission has been most successful in those cases where it has acted somewhat upon the theory upon which the Massachusetts commission is constituted. Over 90 per cent of the complaints made to the national commission have through its influence been adjusted between the railroads and the complainants to the satisfaction of both parties. But in the cases in which the Commission has fulminated decrees as to rates it has accomplished very little for the public or the railroads. Of thirty-four decisions which have been carried to the courts it has been overruled in thirty-two cases and only successful in two. If you want to change the rate-making provisions of the present law, permit the Commission, as now, to declare a rate to be unreasonable and then let them, as in Massachusetts, suggest the rate that they deem reasonable. If their suggestions are rational, they will have public opinion behind them and the railroads will be forced to comply; but arm them, as you do in this bill, with the terrors of the law, with the power to command railroads to make a rate or to fix a so-called maximum rate, with authority to promulgate little statutes, and you are sure to breed antagonism between the Commission and the railroads. Then confer upon them the powers proposed in a bill prepared by a very able member of the Senate, against every species of favoritism, let them proceed in the courts in the interest of individuals who have suffered by unreasonable rates or unfair practices of railroads, have the decision of these cases expedited, and it seems to me you will have made a much better solution of the railroad question than you afford in your bill.

Much could be accomplished by the equal enforcement of the laws already upon the statute books if those who enforce our laws are possessed by the unappeasable rage of justice. Sir, I have no sympathy with that vicious sentiment which would prosecute a man, not because he is guilty, but because he is rich, and that would make our prosecuting offices the refuge of every demagogue and mountebank. But great as is our country, it is not and it never will be great enough to shelter two kinds of law, the one for you and me, for the general mass of American citizenship, and the other for some executive grand duke.

A railroad rate is a fluctuating thing in the cost of its production, and from an economic standpoint no law can fairly fix a future rate which does not fix those material elements upon which the rate depends. As was pertinently asked by Mr. Benton, an able lawyer of my own State, if the State fixes the price that railroads are to receive for transportation, would it fix also the prices that go into the making of the cost of that transportation?

Will it fix the price of coal and ties and iron, the wages of labor, and those other varying elements of the cost of service, all of which absorb by far the greater part of the rates they receive? What prudent man would care to conduct a business with the Government fixing the price at which he should sell his product and leave him subject to the laws of supply and demand for everything he was compelled to buy? A rate that is reasonable to-day may be unreasonable to-morrow simply from the standpoint of the cost of production, and, under the present law, what is a just rate can always be determined at any given time by a court and jury whenever an individual claims that an unreasonable rate has been exacted. The question of unreasonableness can be tested in the courts. The juries will not hesitate to do as they have done in England, and the public will be protected. Is that not far more rational than the method you propose in this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCALL. If I can get through in the limited time which I have, at the end I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

I can not find an economic authority worthy of the name who, prior to one year ago, supported the theory of Government-made rates for this country. After the President had promulgated the notion of rate making as a cure for rebates and discriminations, there appeared a crop of economists whose names had previously escaped the attention of the country, each with a patent nostrum guaranteed to work a cure on the President's plan. It was the heyday of the economic quack. We have even had it proposed, on high authority, that if it were discovered that one of many competing railroads, say, between Chicago and New York, had given low, secret rates, those rates should immediately be declared to be the reasonable rates although they would be forced upon the competing railroads, who were entirely innocent, and might be made bankrupt by them. That is a fair illustration of some of the economic theories that have been evolved upon this question.

It is said that the sentiment of the shippers is behind this rate-making proposition. With the exception of isolated individuals, whatever sentiment has been expressed in favor of this policy did not appear until it was proposed fourteen months ago and was authoritatively put forth as the remedy for the evils of discrimination and the giving of rebates. Even then, few complaints were made that the rates were too high, but that they were unequal, and on the assumption that the proper remedy for that inequality was in the fixing of rates by the Commission, the proposition was supported by business organizations. But the more the plan was studied the less it received the approbation of the business men of the country. The first serious opposition came at the convention of shippers called by Mr. Bacon, the promoter of this movement. The organizations in that convention were those which he himself had selected and the most important of them, and probably the majority of them, were opposed to his scheme and were therefore ruled out of the convention. It is said that those protesting delegations were packed by the railroads. But what shall be said of the great national convention of the boards of trade of the country, the most representative convention of business men that is held upon this continent? This convention, held in the city of Washington during the last month and only a year after this new gospel had been preached, adopted a resolution with regard to rate fixing where the proceeding was to begin with the courts and end with them and was, in effect, a most emphatic condemnation of this policy.

That resolution was adopted by a vote of ten to one of the delegates assembled. And let me say to Members on the other side of the House that this rate-fixing policy found no more uncompromising opponents in that convention than were found among the delegates from the great cities of the South. They saw its viciousness not merely from the traditional Democratic standpoint, but also from the position of self-interest. They saw the South standing exultant upon the threshold of a brilliant era of prosperity, just entering upon her career of industrial glory, and that the railroads will do for her what they have already done for the North and West unless the capital which would naturally be invested in them should be frightened away by this populistic hullabaloo in which you are joining.

Mr. ADAMSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not wish to injure the gentleman by taking his time, but I will endeavor to make reparation. I know the gentleman desires to be correct, therefore I desire to make a correction. I understood the gentleman a few moments ago to declare that under this law excursions could not be permitted without taking time in going before the Commission. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to section 22 of the "act to regulate commerce." It makes a provision for excursions as well as for governmental and charitable purposes.

Mr. McCALL. It may be that I am mistaken, but I think that it is provided that schedules of all rates and fares shall be printed thirty days before they are put in force. That would operate by implication to change the existing law.

I willingly agree that my friend has studied the bill more carefully than I have. But that is my conclusion.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think there was any intention to alter that special section.

Mr. BARTLETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]?

Mr. BARTLETT. May I be permitted to say that in this bill there is a distinct provision that none of the provisions of the act of 1887, unless repealed or altered, are altered by this bill? The saving clause of this particular bill is that it saves to the Commission every right and power they had under the act of 1887.

Mr. McCALL. It covers that particular point of that particular subject in the act of 1887, and what the gentleman says upon that point is all right.

Mr. BARTLETT. We do not cover the point.

Mr. McCALL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I think the bill very clearly covers the point of supplying the schedules for rates for a period of thirty days before they are put in force.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the act of 1887 also.

Mr. McCALL. Yes; I may be mistaken, but I am still of the opinion strongly in my reading of the bill that I am correct. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to the point.

It is contended that the policy of national rate making is necessary in order to avert governmental ownership. Either governmental ownership is an evil or it is not. If it is a wise policy, we should embark upon it, but if it is an evil, the way to avert it is certainly not to take the first long step from economic rectitude that lies in its direction. Some very vicious policies have threatened our country and have been made dangerous by our taking the first step as a compromise. That is true with reference to inflation. It is emphatically true with reference to the coinage of silver, when the reason was given for taking repeated steps in coining or buying that metal that they were necessary to avert free coinage, until finally we had thousands of tons of silver stored in the Treasury, and it was only by an almost unexampled act of Presidential heroism that we did not go to the silver standard by the mere force of gravitation.

You do not propose to have the Government take the railroads by this bill, but you propose to have it take away from the control of the owners their only beneficial interest, which is the rate. It is said by the advocates of the bill, for purposes of prejudice or extenuation, that the securities of our railroads are bountifully watered. If true, that would be a relevant matter, perhaps, for the courts to consider when a shipper claimed that an unreasonable rate had been exacted. Certainly it furnishes no argument for the passage of this bill. It must be considered as a matter of denunciation and indulged in for the purpose of exciting prejudice. But let us see what the fact is. There is no higher authority upon the subject of railroads in the United States than President Hadley, of Yale, who first won distinction as professor of railroad economics in that university.

Last year he made the statement in a letter published in the Boston Transcript—and the letter was by no means generally in favor of our railroads—that the railroads of the country could not be duplicated for $50,000 a mile. In other words, counting their franchises as of no value, the material and labor necessary to duplicate them would be in the aggregate not less than ten and a half or eleven billion dollars, which is substantially the amount of their outstanding capitalization. Probably it would cost the Government, if it undertook to duplicate the work, twice that amount, and that would not include the enormous sums that have been thrown away in reconstruction, where, in order to do away with curves and grades, much original construction has been abandoned. If you count the franchises as nothing—and your railroads can not be duplicated to-day by private enterprise for less than substantially the amount of the capitalization—how can you say that there is any material amount of water in their securities? In the capitalization of some railroads the nominal capital is not equal to the amount actually paid in. In some cases the stock was sold by the railroad at a high premium and the premium went into its treasury. Undoubtedly there are cases where railroads were built over a new country at great risk, where business was not developed, and the men furnishing the capital received stock bonuses. These bonuses were offered openly in order to attract capital necessary for the work. I fancy you will hardly deny that the investor was fairly entitled to a chance for extra profit to pay him for the risk he assumed. If the railroad should turn out to be unprofitable, he might lose his entire investment. The man who paid $2 an acre for his land saw it increase, in many cases, by the building of the railroad, by the jeopardy of the money of other men, to $100 an acre. Are we to call the $98 water? Gentlemen are not heard to advance that theory.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion in that line?

Mr. McCALL. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. The total capitalization of the railroads of the United States is about thirteen billion dollars.

Mr. McCALL. I think the total outstanding capitalization is less than twelve billions.

Mr. MANN. The total amount of stocks and bonds is something over thirteen billion dollars, with a railroad mileage of over two hundred thousand miles. In Great Britain, together with continental countries, the total amount of mileage is considerably less than two hundred thousand miles, with a total capitalization of over eighteen billion dollars, so that the amount of capital we have invested per mile in this country is far less than the amount of capital per mile invested in the roads owned by the European governments or by private ownership there, notwithstanding the prevalent opinion that everything here is watered and everything there is not watered.

Mr. McCALL. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his interruption, and it only adds another excellent authority to the authority whom I have already quoted, President Hadley, of Yale University.

Then it is said that money bonuses and land grants were given to encourage railroad building, and in listening to the very eloquent speech of the gentleman from Michigan on Tuesday I at first thought he was entirely overlooking the fact that there had been any material investment of private capital. That bonuses were given does not now impress me as of the greatest consequence, because the Government, or the people who gave them, did so from the standpoint of their own self-interest, and in many cases they profited richly by the building of the railroad; but I think it fair for gentlemen to correct the order in which they mention the sources of supply of capital to build railroads. I believe I am entirely within the truth when I say your bonuses and grants from national and local governments and individuals would not all combined pay 5 per cent interest for a single year upon our railroad capitalization.

There is no species of property that deserves the grateful consideration of Congress more than the railroad property, for it has conferred incalculable benefits upon the country. Without the railroads our population would be confined to the seaboard and the water courses. Three-fourths of the country would be unsettled and uncivilized. But largely as a result of daring investments that have been made we have to-day, with one-twentieth of the population of the globe, a valuation of more than a hundred billions, or one-third of the entire capital of the globe.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption? The gentleman speaks of one-twentieth population. I think it is important that you also show that with one-twentieth population we are furnishing one-third, or thirty-three and a third per cent, in round numbers, of the entire food products of the world.

Mr. McCALL. Yes.

The great factor in the advancement of America has been the free play given for individual action. If at the outset we had tied up the energies of men by statutes and removed the spur of ambition from the inventor, the railroad builder, and the man of business, the progress of our country would have been far less marked than it has been during the last century, and the progress that the rest of mankind has gained under the influence of our example would also have been less. The American railroad managers, not through altruism or philanthropy, but by their individual genius, called into play by the beneficent influence of our free institutions, have been working out the destiny of the American people. They have helped powerfully to mold a vast and naturally diverse continent into one people. They have, in a double sense, bound together the most remote parts of the country by cords of steel. The have interwoven our interests and our hearts inextricably with the meshes of the iron net. And if they are to receive your denunciation intead of your gratitude, then there is no species of property in the country which may not be plundered by law. There is a prescription that will almost infallibly work in forcing through such legislation. Fiercely denounce some Wall street magnate by name and then add some lurid declamation about insurance, and you could successfully rob any business in the country except farming, and if farmers were not so numerous they too would not escape.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Do you suppose the law would allow any farmer in this country who would be guilty of such an action to escape the penitentiary?

Mr. McCALL. I trust the gentleman did not think I was reflecting upon the farmer.

Mr. ADAMSON. You are claiming immunity for the others.

Mr. McCALL. I was applying your prescription, that was all.

Mr. ADAMSON. My prescription simply requires those who are powerful to do right—to practice equality and justice—as well as the other classes of the people.

Mr. McCALL. That is a magnificent generality upon which you could put any proposition through in legislation.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have not indulged in generalities, but we have provided some magnificent specialties in this bill.

Mr. McCALL. We often make a mistake, I venture to say, in thinking that there is a genuine public opinion. Quite too often here we think there is a raging popular sentiment when it is only that we have a tendency of blood to our heads. The people do not send us here to enact every popular noise into law. [Applause.]

We have seen, then, two clearly defined systems of rate making—that of France and Germany and other foreign countries and that of America. We have seen that the foreign system, although put in force in countries having dense populations and with a relatively low scale of wages has led to high rates and restricted trade, and that any extensive commerce between portions of these countries remote from each other has only been made possible by rivers and canals. On the other hand, we have seen the American system put in force over a sparsely settled area and, although the wage scale has been more than twice that abroad, the average freight rate has been only half as great, and we have seen the most remote parts of a continent trading with each other, the whole country made a common market and a commerce pouring over our railroads not far in volume from the combined railroad commerce of all the rest of the world, an interstate commerce so vast as to make even our prodigious foreign commerce seem insignificant. And you are proposing by this bill to strike down the American system under which these marvels have been produced and substitute the foreign system. Measuring my word and speaking to the exact relation between the system you are overturning and the system you are adopting I say that I believe you are about to vote for the most un-American proposition ever submitted to an American Congress. The fundamental question here, stripped entirely of sentiment, is whether we shall continue the American system, where the rates have inevitably sprung from the action of economic forces, or whether we shall adopt the expensive foreign system of government-made rates and have the management of your railroads thrown into politics, as if there were not already enough in this country upon which the politician can lay his felonious paws. [Applause.]

The Government may, if it desires, provide and operate at its own cost highways over which its citizens may travel and move their property, but it has not been a commonly exercised function to require citizens, at their own cost, to carry the persons and property of other citizens. It certainly has been a no less common function of government to fix the price of bread and to establish public granaries for corn. And if either of these functions must be exercised, it should be under the most careful safeguards or it will be attended with grave danger. Burke says that certain of the Pope's territories, being obliged to furnish Rome and the State granaries with corn, were utterly ruined, and then he adds: "Having looked to the Government for bread, they on the first scarcity will turn and bite the hand that fed them. To avoid that evil, Government will redouble the causes of it." The philosophy of Burke's illustration applies to the pending bill. It is not the least weighty of the objections against it that it will tend to corrupt the American people. It implies no defamation, but only a slight knowledge of human nature to see that you are holding out to them a temptation dangerous to their morality and dangerous also to the rights of private property. Your railroad securities are held in a comparatively small portion of the country, and the great mass of people scattered over the rest of the country, with little interest of ownership, will be interested in cheaper transportation. Will not the pressure of the greater mass of what you call public opinion have the same effect upon the national Commission as it has had upon State commissions, against whose rates the courts have felt compelled to intervene? If so, you must remember that the constitutional safeguards against the National Government are fewer and less effective than against the State governments.

Can anyone justly say, in view of the history of our railroads and the splendid service they are rendering, that the time has arrived for our Government to embark upon so venturesome a policy? The great organizations of labor, with their admirable sense of self-preservation, clearly see the danger.

Your bill pretends to grant a judicial review of orders of the Commission fixing rates, but it adopts the device of permitting this to the railroad on the peril of its life. If the railroad avails itself of your inestimable privilege of review and the courts decide in its favor, it costs the Government nothing and the railroad has the enjoyment of its former rate; but if, as has happened in two cases out of thirty-four, the court sustains the Commission, the railroad, if it has not adopted the Commission's rate, which may prove to be confiscatory, must pay a penalty to the Government of $5,000 per day, multiplying each day by the number of times the rate is enforced, a penalty that in some cases would mount into the millions. Do you call this a fair judicial review? Would there be any taint of a "square deal" in saying to a man whom a police justice had fined, "Yes; the justice may be wrong, as justices usually are, and you may appeal; but if the higher court happens to sustain the justice, you shall lose your life?"

Mr. ADAMSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not the gentleman think that the carriers can avoid all such risks by putting in force the rates fixed while they litigate to set them aside?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly; and that illustrates the point. You are trying to coerce the carrier on penalty of his life.

Mr. ADAMSON. But if a man is going to the penitentiary he may appeal without asking a supersedeas, then if he does not win he saves that much time.

Mr. McCALL. There is no such proceeding in the bill, as I understand it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman certainly does not understand that there is no provision in this bill permitting an interlocutory order by the court to stay the enforcement of the order until it can be adjudicated? This bill provides for the interlocutory order.

Mr. McCALL. I think it is doubtful if that is in. Evidently the gentleman's opinion is different from the opinion of his colleague who just interrupted me. I understood him to say the railroad might yield and adopt the rate.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggested that he might litigate the rate without asking a supersedeas.

Mr. BARTLETT. I started to say it is true that it says unless it is stopped by an injunction. I apprehend that the gentleman must know and believe as a lawyer that it is not in the power of Congress to prevent a railroad from appealing to the court and the processes of the court until the questions have been decided.

Mr. McCALL. In my opinion it is entirely clear that that is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wish I could make it accomplish that.

Mr. McCALL. There may be evidence of a sense of justice in all this, but, if so, it is the sense of justice not of man, but of the hyena and the bear. The philosophy of it is that you may run for your life, but you are eaten if you stand, and you will be eaten if you are caught. Compared with the scheme of this bill there is a certain nobility in the policy of government ownership, wrong as I believe that policy to be. You carve our magnificent railroad system not as a feast fit for the gods, but hew it as a carcass fit for hounds.

We pass laws here with an easy optimism and a profound faith that, so great are the American people, their prosperity is proof even against vicious government. And so the two great parties, in playing the game of politics, sometimes vie with each other in pandering to the popular passion of the hour, and court the roar of the galleries rather than history's approving voice. Undoubtedly the splendid strength and youth of the American people are well-nigh unconquerable, but no state was ever yet so great that a persistence in evil courses could not lay it low. We may presume too far. If we are guilty of reckless and impulsive action here we may wreck the nation. If you will pardon an old fable: As the boy Phaeton, driving the horses of the sun, but lacking Apollo's darting glance and unerring touch of rein, did not follow the safe middle course, and thus wrought havoc to both the earth and sky; so by impulse and unsteadiness in driving this Washington chariot of ours, now steering too high and now too low, we may put our American constellations to flight, dry up the courses of our iron rivers, and make of our fertile prairies the sands of another Libya. [Applause.]

In some remarks which I submitted on this floor one year ago upon a similar measure I dwelt upon what I regard as much more important aspects of the proposed legislation than its economic features. I shall not repeat what I then said, but content myself with the barest reference. This bill makes an enormous contribution to what I regard as an evil of the times—the steady encroachment of the legislature upon liberty. Our boasted American freedom is being construed to mean the power to weld statutory fetters upon the individual—to impose upon our own selves a species of slavery. We sometimes say that we are restraining the individual in the interest of the other eighty millions, and we thus take away the rights of every individual man in the whole mass and sacrifice liberty to a mere abstraction. This is a condition abhorrent to the idea of the founders of the Republic, who knew that men had suffered as greatly from too much as from too little government; that they had thousands of times been punished by law for actions essentially virtuous, and so, taking care to safeguard that high kind of liberty which would protect the individual against the encroachments of the Government, they set our State upon the middle course that lies between anarchy and despotism. This tendency to too much government is not confined to one party, for I have observed that gentlemen who delight most in quoting the immortal Jefferson are sometimes the fondest of imposing these fetters upon the people. The aggregate achievement of individuals has made America. To my mind, American freedom is individual freedom. Give men as much liberty as you can consistently with order and under the stimulus of freedom and order and the right to enjoy what they accomplish and what they gain this nation will keep magnificently moving on.

And then there is centralization. At the rate we are now moving it will not be long before we regulate everything and everybody from Washington. You can not govern the whole universe from a single point and have a shred of liberty survive.

Instead of chasing every will-o'-the-wisp that shows itself upon somebody's horizon, let us then guide ourselves by the great first principles of the American Government. And to return to this bill, you will have, in my opinion, a better railroad system and a better people if you safeguard in the courts the fundamental right of every man to a reasonable and equal rate and permit those rates to respond, as they have hitherto, to economic forces. In the conditions existing to-day I believe the people would shrink from governmental ownership, because of the expense and danger incident to governmental management. But that expense and that danger would certainly not be less when you make our Interstate Commission general managers of railroads built and owned and operated at the risk of private capital. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MONDELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 8.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made with a view to providing a harbor suitable for the largest boats at a point opposite or near the following-described land: Sections Nos. 33 and 34, township 37, range 8 west, Lake County, Ind.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL], my colleague on the committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, while I do not agree with the conclusions reached by the gentleman from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat, the magnificence of his address, his splendid logic, and the rhetoric with which it was adorned, in my judgment, add dignity and honor to the entire membership of this House. [Loud applause.]

The natural timidity, Mr. Chairman, which I always feel when addressing the House of Representatives is intensified on this occasion by the importance of the subject in hand. Probably no question will come before the Fifty-ninth Congress which approaches in its importance the one arising on this bill. It is claimed that there are more than $13,000,000,000 invested in the railways in the United States and that their stockholders, employees, and laborers number almost 2,000,000 persons. If these statements be true, and we apprehend their full significance, it still will not unfold to us the true import of this great question.

It is said that in 1904 the railway tonnage of the United States amounted to more than 170,000,000,000 tons. Seventy-five per cent of the railway traffic in our country is interstate, and interstate railway rates affect every consumer, every producer, every business man, every laborer in the land. They mean prosperity or poverty not only to the busy marts of trade with their teeming thousands of people, but they reach out to the more obscure sections of the country where the man of smaller means and more unpretentious ambition is struggling for success. So that in order to grasp the full meaning of this great problem we must include in our vision not only the railway capital and the railway employees, but we must also look beyond these to the almost 90,000,000 of American people and the almost $75,000,000,000 of American wealth.

Mr. Chairman, these great considerations cast upon us proportionate responsibilities, and it is our duty to approach the settlement of this great question in a spirit of candor, of frankness, and of courage. No bill before this House has proposed to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the general authority to make rates for railways engaged in interstate commerce. The President has not recommended and no one here has advocated any improper interference with the business of the railways. The gentleman who addressed the House a few moments ago, the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], who addressed the House upon yesterday, proceeded upon the false premise that we are proposing to clothe this Interstate Commerce Commission with a general rate-fixing power. They have set themselves up a man of straw and then proceeded to demolish it with the herculean energy displayed by them both.

Misleading statements of this kind have been repeatedly made; but, sir, they are untrue, and they but add confusion to the proper settlement of this great question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday, and the gentleman from Massachusetts a few moments ago, proceeded to assail this legislation upon the ground that it was of recent (as they style it) fungous growth; that it was an innovation upon our general ideas of legislation in this regard.

Mr. SHERLEY. If it will not embarrass the gentleman, before he leaves the proposition of whether this bill does or does not give general rate-making power, I would like to ask him this question: Does not this legislation give to the Commission the power that they contended they had in the Maximum Rate Case?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will reach that further along in my argument, and answer that satisfactorily to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course I do not want to disturb the line of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday, and the gentleman from Massachusetts a few moments ago, claimed that we were innovating upon American institutions. The gentleman from Massachusetts characterized this bill as un-American, and, sir, being proud of the fact that I am an American, I know of no greater stigma that could be cast upon this measure. The gentleman from Pennsylvania said it was a return to the days of Jack Cade, and spoke of spoliation, of anarchism, and of riot and blood, until finally his remarks suggested to me that probably late the night before he had engaged in the enjoyment of a Welsh rarebit, and therefore had these frightfully grotesque images floating through his brain. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, let us for just a moment trace the history of legislation falling in the general class of that contained in this bill; let us see what the facts are, Mr. Chairman.

I want to refer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] to a comparatively old case in the Supreme Court Reports of the United States, which contains some valuable political history. I invite the attention of the gentleman to this particular phase of this case, because he has declared that he was not a lawyer; but he can see the history of this great legislation as it is contained in the reports of the country.

In the case of Munn against The State of Illinois, which is one of the so-called "Granger cases," Chief Justice Waite traces the history of this character of legislation from its early inception down to the delivery of that opinion. For instance, he says this:

With the fifth amendment in force, Congress in 1820 conferred power upon the city of Washington to regulate the rates of wharfage at private wharves, the sweeping of chimneys, and to fix the rates of fees therefor, and the weight and quality of bread; and in 1848 to make all necessary regulations respecting hackney carriages and the rates of fare of the same, and the rates of hauling by cartmen, wagoners, carmen, and draymen, and the rates of commission of auctioneers.

Now, these acts were passed, one in 1820, and the other in 1848. The opinion proceeds:

This brings us to inquire as to the principle upon which this power of regulation rests, in order that we may determine what is within and what without its operative effect. Looking, then, to the common law, from whence came the right which the Constitution protects, we find that when private property is affected with a public interest it ceases to be juris privati only. This was said by Lord Chief Justice Hale more than two hundred years ago in his treatise De Portibus Maris (1 Harg. Law Tracts, 78), and has been accepted without objection as an essential element in the law of property ever since. Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created.

And the opinion still further proceeds:

Thus, as to ferries, Lord Hale says, in his treatise De Jure Maris (1 Harg. Law Tracts, 6), "The King has a right of franchise or privilege that no man may set up a common ferry for all passengers without a prescription time out of mind or a charter from the King. He may make a ferry for his own use or the use of his family, but not for the common use of all the King's subjects passing that way, because it doth in consequence tend to a common charge, and is become a thing of public interest and use, and every man for his passage pays a toll which is a common charge, and every ferry ought to be under public regulation, namely, that it give attendance at due times, keep a boat in due order, and take but reasonable toll, for, if he fail in these, he is finable."

Now, I might trace the matter on down further, but it would be a useless consumption of the time. It shows that more than two hundred years ago the great principle upon which this bill rests was recognized by our forefathers in England and was brought over here with our ancestors and made a part of American jurisprudence.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the principle of the regulation of railway rates by commissions is too well settled to need discussion here. There are sixteen States in the American Union to-day with railway commissions clothed with mandatory powers in the regulation of State railway rates. There are twelve other States with railway commissions that possess advisory powers. Each one, I think, of these State commission laws creating commissions with mandatory powers has been before the courts of last resort, either in the State where they were created or in the Supreme Court of the United States, and their constitutionality has been upheld, though they were provided for in State jurisdictions where the great coordinate departments of government were divided into three branches—legislative, executive, and judicial—just as they are under the Federal Constitution. But these State commissions, on account of the constitutional limits between State and Federal authority, only reach about 25 per cent of the railway traffic, and so public attention has become fixed upon Congress.

The subject of the regulation of interstate rates is not a new one. It excited the attention of President Grant in 1872. It was the subject of Congressional investigation in 1874, an investigation which resulted in the famous Windom report. Let me digress here to say that the regulation of railroads by the Federal authority was first propounded in this country in 1878 by that distinguished Member of Congress from Texas, Judge John H. Reagan. [Applause.]

Ex-Governor Larrabee, of Iowa, says that Judge Reagan's bill was the first effective regulation of railway rates that was attempted in the Congress of the United States. In my judgment this country fails to show in all of its records a man of loftier patriotism or of purer character than the great commoner from Texas. [Applause.] After he had gone into the other branch of Congress and our State went into the regulation of railway rates through the commission system, he was called upon by the governor of Texas to serve as chairman of that commission, and he laid aside the Senatorial toga and went back to Texas, assuming a more onerous position at a less salary; and I say to you, sir, that when the roster of the heroes of peace and progress is made up, high among them all, in letters luminous with honor and renown, will appear the name of John H. Reagan, of Texas. [Applause.]

From 1878 until the passage of our interstate-commerce law in 1887 this question of the regulation of interstate rates by this body was constantly and increasingly in the public mind. That interstate-commerce law declared against extortions and discriminations; it gave legislative declaration of the old common-law doctrine that all rates shall be reasonable, and it prohibited unreasonable rates, and in its first section, according to my recollection, it empowered the Commission to enforce and to execute the provisions of that act. The Commission was organized under that law. It proceeded to assume the duties which it thought were cast upon it by the act creating it. For ten years it heard complaints of unreasonable rates. For ten years it determined those complaints, and where it found a rate to be unreasonable it so declared, and substituted a reasonable rate in its place.

In 1897 the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of The Interstate Commerce Commission v. The Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railroad Company held that the act of Congress organizing the Commission failed to vest the Commission with the power to substitute a reasonable for an unreasonable rate; that they might review the unreasonable rate, declare it to be unreasonable, but they could not substitute for it a rate which they found to be reasonable, that they could not fix a rate for the future, and thus the Commission was shorn of the rate-revising power, which up to that time it had assumed to exercise.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield now?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman, as he is discussing the maximum-rate case, tell the House how many schedules were involved in that case?

Mr. RUSSELL. My understanding was that it involved every schedule where complaint was made under section 13. How many during the whole history of the Commission there were, I am unable to state.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not a fact that it involved many hundreds of rates?

Mr. RUSSELL. Perhaps so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, will the gentleman answer my question which I propounded a few moments ago—whether this legislation gives to this Commission the power it then claimed to have in the Maximum Rate Case?

Mr. RUSSELL. My judgment is that the section conferring the rate-revising power, in section 15 of this bill, could only authorize the Commission to act where complaint had been lodged with it against some rate complained of as being unreasonable.

Mr. SHERLEY. Wasn't that true of the old law?

Mr. RUSSELL. Possibly so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would they now not have the right under the power this bill undertakes to confer after complaint filed to make an order affecting hundreds of rates?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think so, Mr. Chairman, unless the rates so affected were within the complaint filed with the Commission. I think the filing of the complaint specifying the rate complained of is a jurisdictional fact without which the Commission would not have a right to act.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I want to make a suggestion for the benefit of the gentleman from Kentucky. The only limitation, as I understand it, in this bill differing from the original power claimed would be on the question of full hearings, and that the Commission—if complaint were made under this bill as was made in the Maximum Rate Case, involving all of the rates in the six classifications of the southern classification of freight—that the Commission could only change a rate upon which it had a full hearing. In that case they changed hundreds of rates that never were mentioned in the hearings.

Mr. RUSSELL. So, Mr. Chairman, by the decision in the Maximum Rate Case, in 167 United States, as I remarked a moment ago, the Commission was shorn of its rate-revising power, and we are now presented this question that is like a cast-iron column in its simplicity—shall we let the law stand as it is now, with the barren, fruitless authority conferred on the Commission, or shall we make that law effective by giving the Commission the right when it finds a rate to be unreasonable to substitute for it a reasonable rate? Shall we allow the act of Congress prohibiting unreasonable rates to stand as a useless legislative declaration "as idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean," or shall we give it vitality and power? In other words, shall we have an imperfect law with simply the declaratory features, or shall we have a perfect statute with proper declaratory, directory, and remedial features? Shall we content ourselves with harmless fulmination against unreasonable rates, or shall we provide the machinery of the law by which they can be made reasonable? That is the question for discussion.

This is not a partisan question, but in order to preserve the truth of history something ought to be said as to its political features.

Not in a spirit of acrimony, but with genuine hospitality, I want to say to you, brethren over on the other side of the aisle, that we Democrats welcome you to this Democratic feast. We will not even look askance at you when you take the head of the table and proceed to do the carving. We are content with the reflection that, so far as we are concerned, wherever the Democratic Macgregor sits there is the head of the table. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] We take delight in seeing you wear these Democratic clothes, and I must say that they fit you more becomingly than any of the monopoly, trust, and high-tariff toggery with which you have promenaded over the country for a quarter of a century. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] But when you come out of the dining hall and take your seat on the front portico and put your feet up on the balustrade as though you owned the premises, I do want to remind you that you have not got a tax title to a grain of sand on it. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman is willing to admit that while his side always resolves we act?

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman please state in this connection who the Democratic Macgregor is?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is the entire Democratic party. We have no individual whom we follow blindly on any of these matters. [Laughter and applause.] Now, let us trace the history of these parties on this subject just briefly. The first and only platform declaration that the Republicans ever made on this question was in the platform of 1884. They there declared in favor of regulating corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The interstate-commerce act that we are now seeking to amend was passed in 1887. The Commission exercised the authority I have just adverted to for ten years. The decision stripping them of that power was rendered in 1897. There has never been a day since that opinion was rendered that the Republican party has not been in complete command of the Government and able at any time to restore to the people's servants the right to protect them from rapacity and extortion, and yet not one platform declaration has fallen from your lips and not one act of Congress has been passed giving the people relief.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I might suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated that the Republicans have always acted.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is my friend and I admire him very much, but that was one of the impulsive declarations that frequently characterize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JAMES. I merely wanted to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL] was convincing him that for ten or twelve years they have failed to act, and I thought that possibly that had escaped his attention.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think it did, but like the boy going through the graveyard he is whistling to keep up his courage. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Because we are now acting, whereas you never acted on that side in the course of many years' control of the Government, and probably never would think of it if somebody else were not in control.

Mr. JAMES. I would suggest that the gentleman's party is acting here this session like they acted last session, but they have not acted over yonder—that is, in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I wish the gentleman were able to act over yonder himself.

Mr. JAMES. If I were, this bill would go through all right.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, since this diversion has occurred I desire to restate the proposition, that since 1897, when the declaration was made by the court of last resort in this country that this Commission did not have the power which we are now all seeking to give to it, during all those years, with the Republican party in complete control, they have never done that which they now concede ought to have been done. We have had no chance since 1897 to give this relief, and all we could do, as suggested by my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], was to pass resolutions showing what we would do if we had the power which you have possessed. In 1896 the Democratic party in its national platform made this declaration:

> The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railway systems, and the formation of trusts and pools requires stricter control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and such restrictions and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

And in this connection let me remind you that in the title of the bill you have under consideration you actually adopted the language of the Democratic platform of 1896, and style this—

> An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. In other words, we gave you the title of the bill and took the substance.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask, if this power which the gentleman says the Commission had until 1897 was taken away from them in that year—the power that we now propose to give—why did the Democratic party in 1896, a year before it was taken, insist that it should be given?

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] well knows that in the case reported in 162 United States, reported previous to the Maximum Rate Case, it was generally understood that when that question did reach the courts the very decision rendered in 167 United States would be announced by that body. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And I will state this to the gentleman: In my judgment as a lawyer there is no escape from the logic of the opinion rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Maximum Rate Case.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman then think of the judgment of the Commission that for ten years was contending for a different thing?

Mr. RUSSELL. The judgment of the Commission may have been erroneous, just as I am sure the judgment of the gentleman from Kentucky is erroneous about another matter which we have discussed.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman think about the judgment of the Democratic party, which had complete control of the Government?

Mr. RUSSELL. When the interstate-commerce law was passed?

Mr. MANN. As the gentleman knows, the Interstate Commerce Commission did not have the power to fix rates—as a lawyer the gentleman so states—but the Democratic party, in complete control of the Government, made no effort to change the law.

Mr. RUSSELL. The act passed in 1887 was presumed by the country and by the Commission to grant that power, and the Democratic party saw no necessity for a change in it until the decision in the one hundred and sixty-second Report, but as soon as that opinion was delivered they began at once, in 1896, to demand an increase of this power.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman says——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Texas yield? Gentlemen must obtain recognition from the Chair before interrupting the gentleman.

Mr. RUSSELL. My friends can interrupt me, Mr. Chairman. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman states in his opinion as a lawyer, and his opinion as a lawyer is as good as anyone I could obtain——

Mr. RUSSELL. Thank you.

Mr. MANN. That the Supreme Court could not do otherwise than decide the Maximum Rate Case as it did. If the Commission did not have authority to fix the rate now, will the gentleman have us to understand the Democratic party had no lawyers able to reach that understanding before the Supreme Court decision? You had the President and you had the House and you had the Senate, you had control of the Government by an overwhelming majority, and yet you made no effort to change that law and confer that power upon the Commission, and I agree with the gentleman that anybody reading the law would have known the Commission did not have the power they sought to exercise.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman from Texas does not agree with you. I say it was a very fair presumption for the country and for the Commission to indulge that the act of 1887 conferred upon that body the right to substitute a reasonable for an unreasonable rate. But after the court had passed upon it my judgment of the question was convinced by the logic of the opinion that was rendered in 1897. Before that opinion was delivered it was the general impression that the Commission had power to fix a rate for the future, and under the provisions of the act, as I stated a moment ago, any lawyer could have presumed it conferred such power by that section which authorized that Commission to enforce the provisions of the act.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the Democratic party learned that from the decision of the Supreme Court, as it learned in a great many other cases, and I hope they will follow the opinion as well as in some other cases?

Mr. HAMILTON. Did not Judge Cooley, while a member of the Commission, deny the authority of the Commission to regulate rates repeatedly?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is a mooted question. Mr. Clements, in his testimony before the Senate committee, says "no," and I am not prepared to say which is correct.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As a matter of fact, Judge Cooley never did decide that, but agreed with his colleagues often to the contrary. But what I want to ask you is this: Is it not a fact that the railroads for a number of years obeyed the orders of the Commission reducing rates, and every year Judge Cooley and Mr. Morrison—I believe there were three Democrats and two Republicans on the Commission—wrote a unanimous opinion in each of those cases? They thought they did have power.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think that is true.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you know where Judge Cooley said or stated in the articles he wrote that the Commission did not have the power?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not now recall the articles to which the gentleman from Tennessee refers. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to detain the House too long at this point, because I want to address myself to some other features of this legislation. The Democratic platform in 1900 said:

We favor such enlargement of the scope of the interstate-commerce law as will enable the Commission to protect individuals and communities from discrimination and the public from unjust and unfair transportation charges.

This was reiterated in the platform of 1904. That year the national Democratic convention declared:

We demand an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief from the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation. We demand a strict enforcement of existing civil and criminal statutes against all such trusts, combinations, and monopolies; and we demand the enactment of such further legislation as may be necessary effectually to suppress them.

Therefore, during all these years, while the Democratic party in State and national platforms was protesting that this relief ought to be granted, the Republican party, though enthroned in power, was silent as the tomb. Now, aroused by an outraged public sentiment, you are being whipped into action. The President sends in a message upon the rate question, and as soon as that occurs the air is filled with such interrogatories as "Do you stand with the President?" "Are you following the President?" "Do you favor the President's rate policy?"

Now, I want to answer that as far as I am concerned. If the President of the United States favors the Democratic policy of clothing this Commission with the right to substitute a reasonable for an unreasonable rate, then I stand with him, because he will be standing with us. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, where does the President stand on this question? What is the President's attitude on this question? On the 6th of December the President sent to Congress his first message, as I now recall it, upon the rate question. And it is in these words:

While I am of the opinion that at present it would be undesirable, if it were not impracticable, finally to clothe the Commission with authority to fix railroad rates, I do believe that, as a fair security to shippers, the Commission should be vested with the power, where a given rate has been challenged and after a full hearing is found to be unreasonable, to decide, subject to judicial review, what reasonable rate shall take its place, the ruling of the Commission to take effect immediately and to obtain unless and until it is revised by the court of review.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a clear, compact, unambiguous declaration of a proposition that has my hearty support. In this declaration the President favors giving the railroad commission larger power. He favors authorizing the Commission to substitute an unreasonable with a reasonable rate and to put that power of the Commission into effect at once, subject only to review by the courts; but as soon as the President announced that doctrine the railways of this country girded their thews for the fray and accepted the challenge thrown out in that declaration. The Members of this House know how our mail enlarged with arguments and appeals from every source and corner protesting against that view embodied in the President's message of 1904.

Whatever else may be said of the railways, they are fighters and they are not quitters. You may whip them the first five days of the week, but they will fight you just as gamely on Saturday. But did we not have in the President a fighter and not a quitter? Would not the President have charged at San Juan Hill, just as many of us thought he did, if he had been there? [Laughter.] Is the President a quitter? Let the sequel answer.

The International Railway Congress met in Washington in May, I think, of last year. During that time the President was making a tour of the West. And while that congress was here they flouted a challenge to the President, which was quickly accepted by him in a speech he made at Denver before the chamber of commerce. The President, on the 8th day of May, I think, spoke before that body to the toast "The nation." What an inspiring theme! The people were back of the President; their plaudits were ringing in his ears. With high courage the President faced his foes with this defiant challenge:

I want to say a word as to a governmental policy in which I feel this country ought to take a great interest and which is itself but a part of general policy to which I think our Government must go. I proposed a policy of extending the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of giving them particularly the power to fix rates and to have the rates that they fix go into effect practically at once.

Mr. Chairman, the President is a college-bred man and trained in the exact use of words, and when he tells us that he favors giving the Commission the power to fix rates we know that by the term "fix rates" he meant to have us understand to definitely settle rates, to determine rates, to establish definitely the railway rates.

So the battle went on, and the people rallied to the President and loved him for the enemies he had made. But just prior to this session of Congress strange stories found their way into the public press. It began to be said that the President was too good a party man to disrupt his party on the rate question; that he was a Republican first and patriotic afterwards; and it begun to be reported that somebody had surrendered and that there was a white flag floating over the White House. At last the President's message on the rate question came to Congress. Here is what he said in his message to this Congress:

In my judgment the most important provision which such law should contain is that conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a given rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and if it is found to be unreasonable and unjust, then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the maximum reasonable rate, as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts.

Oh, what a fall was there, my countrymen! When this declaration of purpose was made the din of conflict was hushed. People who had fought the President and denounced his policy and proclaimed that it would bring havoc and ruin upon the country now became his friends. "Powerful railroad influences" began to publish to the world that they "stood with the President," and "peace once more reigned in Warsaw." Who was converted? Was there a change of heart by the railroad presidents and their general counsel, or has somebody surrendered?

Let us examine this last declaration of faith. To prescribe the "maximum reasonable rate," says the President in his message. "A maximum reasonable rate!" With that written into the law does anybody doubt that the railways would always prescribe the highest reasonable rate? What is a maximum reasonable rate? It is a rate beyond which to go one iota would be extortion. A maximum reasonable rate! Suppose that were written into the law and a case should arise between a carrier and a shipper. Now, you can not take away from the courts their power to review an unlawful finding by the Commission. It is fixed in the Constitution, and it is inherent in the judicial as one of the great independent coordinate departments of the Government. Now, the Commission would be empowered, under this suggestion of the President, to find the "maximum reasonable rate"—that is, in my judgment, it would be limited to fixing the dividing line between reasonableness and extortion. The finding of the Commission can be set aside by the court upon two grounds, one of the grounds being that they have exceeded the authority granted by the act of their creation, and the other where they have fixed a rate which violates the fifth amendment to the Constitution as being in effect confiscatory. So the Commission finds a rate. It attempts to find and fix the "maximum reasonable rate." But it makes a mistake in judgment. The maximum reasonable rate, to illustrate in this case, we will say, would be 50 cents per hundred; the minimum rate would be 40 cents per hundred. To go above 50 would be extortion; to go below 40 would be confiscation. The Commission attempts to fix a maximum reasonable rate and fixes it at 45 cents, and the case goes to the court. The court will say, in my judgment, that the Commission has exceeded the power given to it by the act that created it. I think that is the fair intendment of the reasoning in the Maximum Rate case. The rate assailed by this Commission was an unreasonable rate, and it substituted a rate that was reasonable, but not the maximum reasonable rate, and the authority conferred in the act was to find the maximum reasonable rate, and therefore, though the rate is not extortionate or confiscatory, yet, not having fixed the maximum reasonable rate, they exceeded the power given in the act of their creation, and the court will reverse them, and the court itself, being powerless to relieve because the court can not fix a rate for the future, the shipper will have to go back and start it all over again.

Mr. HEPBURN. Do you not think that all this talk of having a maximum reasonable rate and a minimum reasonable rate is a good deal like talking about the tolerably good egg or a moderately virtuous woman?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know about that, but the whole difference I will say, if we are to have the law as it now stands and the "maximum reasonable rate" theory of the President, would be the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he considers that the court has the right to review a finding of fact of the Commission, and if he does think so, what character of an act does he consider the Commission's act in fixing the rate is—whether legislative, administrative, or what?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am coming to that very proposition. The proposition as it presents itself to my mind is, that when you attempt to impose upon the Commission authority to fix a maximum reasonable rate, the court will hold it to be a limitation upon the power of the Commission to fix the rate, and so hold that whenever the Commission goes beyond the limitation thus imposed, its action will be unlawful, and for that reason the court can set it aside.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. I do not know much about this business, and I should like to get a little information. I should like to inquire what the difference is between a "maximum reasonable rate" and a "reasonable rate." If a thing is reasonable it is reasonable; if it is round it is round; if it is square it is square. What difference does it make to call it "maximum" or "minimum?"

Mr. RUSSELL. All the difference in the world.

Mr. PALMER. That is what I want to know.

Mr. RUSSELL. Now, I have not the time to explain it here; but I will say to my friend who asked this question, I assume, in good faith, and I take it in good part, that if he will take the Senate hearings and read the testimony of Mr. Victor Morawetz, who, I believe, is the author of a work on "Private Corporations," he will find that elaborately explained. A rate may be reasonable without being the highest reasonable rate. Any rate is reasonable that is between the lines of confiscation on the one hand and extortion upon the other. When it approaches extortion it is the maximum reasonable rate. When it approaches confiscation it is the minimum reasonable rate. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman where in the bill he finds the term "maximum reasonable rate?"

Mr. RUSSELL. It is not in this bill. It was stricken out upon the amendment offered by the Democratic members of the committee.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I find the language to be——

Mr. RUSSELL—

Shall fix a rate which shall be the maximum to be charged—

Is the language of the bill.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The language of the bill is:

To determine and describe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged.

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That is to say, they are to find out what the just and reasonable rate is, and to say to the railroad, "You can not charge more than that."

Mr. RUSSELL. That is exactly it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman from Texas will allow me, I think the gentleman from Massachusetts misunderstood him. The gentleman from Texas was discussing the President's message and not the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill has been improved in that respect through amendments offered by the minority and patriotically accepted by the majority members of the committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am trying to show that in the bill as we now propound it to this House, after my Democratic colleagues and my Republican brethren in the committee have conferred about it, we have made a limitation upon the power of the railroads to charge, instead of making a limitation upon the power of the Commission to fix the rate.

Mr. BURLESON. Is that in advance of the President's recommendation?

Mr. RUSSELL. Why, certainly; altogether different.

Mr. MACON. Before the gentleman leaves that question of a maximum reasonable rate, I should like to ask him if the line of demarcation between a maximum reasonable rate and an extortionate rate is not about as dim as the line between counties or the line between States?

Mr. RUSSELL. Unquestionably so. That is a very apt illustration which my friend from Arkansas has given.

Now, along the line of argument that I have been pursuing, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this session of Congress is the first session where a bill has been offered in this body proposing to limit the power of the Commission to fix a maximum reasonable rate. It was not in the bill offered by my distinguished friend from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN, at the last session. It was not in the bill known as the Esch-Townsend bill, that passed this House at the last session, and I will show you. I have a copy of that part of the Esch-Townsend bill, and here is what it says:

The Commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to declare and order what shall be a just and reasonable rate, practice, or regulation to be charged, imposed, or followed in the future, in place of that found to be unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory.

That is the language of the Esch-Townsend bill, and it is practically the language of the bill introduced in this House by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HENRY of Texas and Mr. WANGER rose.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will yield first to my colleague [Mr. HENRY of Texas], and I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] afterwards.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I should like to make a suggestion or ask a question along this line. At the last session of Congress in the Esch-Townsend bill the word "maximum" was not used.

Mr. BARTLETT. Nor in any other bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have just read the language of that bill.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The question was not mooted. The President did not mention it in his message, as you have just said, but in his speech at Raleigh, N. C., he pronounced the doctrine of maximum reasonable rates.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, prior to that time the railroad officials had all controverted this intended legislation; but is it not a fact that as soon as the President announced the maximum-rate theory in his North Carolina speech, a number of railway officials and lawyers tumbled over themselves to get into the band wagon and accept that theory?

Mr. BARTLETT. Railway presidents.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think that is so. I think it can be truthfully asserted that when that feature manifested itself people who had theretofore denounced the President and had said that this bill would bring havoc and ruin upon the country began to publish to the world the fact that they stood with the President, and the troubled waters were once more at peace.

Mr. BURLESON rose.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the gentleman from Texas will pardon me, I promised to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER].

Mr. WANGER. Under the provisions of the Esch-Townsend bill, when the Commission fixed the rate to be charged in the future, that would have compelled the railroad company to have made that exact charge and nothing else.

Mr. RUSSELL. It would have been an absolute rate, in my judgment.

Mr. WANGER. Does not my friend think that the purpose and meaning of the President, just as the purpose and meaning of the committee in reporting this bill, was to give the effect of the finding of the Commission, to hold the railroad company down to that rate and leave it free to substitute any lower rate at its pleasure?

Mr. RUSSELL. I would not undertake to say what the purpose and meaning of the President was, but I have stated what, in my judgment, was a fair import of the language he has used and what construction the courts would have given that language if we had embraced it in this bill.

Mr. WANGER. I asked the gentleman whether it is not the purpose of the committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. Unquestionably, in this bill. In this bill the Commission could not be limited to fixing the maximum reasonable rate; we made this bill so that this Commission will have the power, where a given rate is complained of and found to be unreasonable, to fix a reasonable rate, which shall be the maximum the railroad company can charge.

Mr. WANGER. And leave the railroad company to charge any lower rate?

Mr. RUSSELL. They can charge any lower rate they see fit.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think the gentleman wants to be entirely fair.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do.

Mr. HEPBURN. If he does, he will promptly say that the Republican members of the committee, when presented with the minority bill that was presented to them when this condition was made, insisted that their interpretation of the language used in that bill was precisely the same as that used in this bill, and that its modification was made simply because our Democratic brethren preferred it. We insisted that it made no difference.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is true. I will go farther and say that I am not attempting in the least to reflect upon the patriotism of the Republican membership of this committee. I will say further I do not know of a gentleman in this House for whom I entertain higher regard as a statesman, and a patriot, and an able lawyer than my distinguished friend from Iowa. [Applause.]

But let us go farther. I see, gentlemen, that this is provocative of so much controversy that I am going to turn to another phase of this subject a few moments. In the report of the Esch-Townsend bill this was the language that was used:

> Your committee, however, believe that the great demands of the people are, first, that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be vested with power to determine, after full hearing, not only what is the just and reasonable rate, regulation, or practice, but at the same time to determine and to declare what is just and reasonable, and that such determination shall become operative as soon as practicable.

Now, let us go back to the proposition that I have asserted before the House at the outset. That is this: That up to this session of Congress no bill offered in this body proposed to limit the power of the Commission to the fixing of the maximum reasonable rate, and when you brought it in this way for the first time we Democrats were the ones who opposed it, and our opposition resulted in this bill before the House, known as the "Hepburn bill," in which the power of the Commission is not limited to a maximum reasonable rate, but a reasonable rate which shall be the maximum the company can charge.

Mr. BURLESON. And the bill is not in accordance with the recommendation of the President.

Mr. RUSSELL. No.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do.

Mr. MANN. I introduced a bill at the last session of Congress expressly providing that the rate to be fixed should be the maximum rate to be charged and that no higher rate could be charged.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will accept the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It was not a reasonable rate.

Mr. MANN. It was a reasonable rate. I do not understand that the gentleman from Texas is obliged to read all the bills introduced into the House, although I think it would be of interest to him and he might get some instruction from them. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman has referred to the fact that for ten years the old Commission exercised the power of fixing rates. I will ask the gentleman now if, in every order it ever made, it did not fix in express terms the maximum rate, simply saying they shall charge not to exceed a certain sum?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think so. That is what we have put in this bill, but we do not limit the power of the Commission to fixing the maximum here. The limitation, as I said a moment ago, is a limitation on the right of a railroad company to charge rather than a limitation on the power of the Commission to fix the rate.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, I will not interrupt the gentleman again. This language in regard to the maximum reasonable rate I would like to be enlightened upon. On page 10, section 4 of the bill, this language occurs: It shall have the right "to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged."

Now, suppose that a rate is fixed by the Commission and that rate is not confiscatory, is it not required that the Commission shall make a rate that is fairly remunerative, whether it be the maximum reasonable rate or not, and if the Commission fails to fix a rate that is fairly remunerative, regardless of whether it is the maximum reasonable rate or not, does not that confer upon the courts the power to say that the Commission has gone further than it is entitled to go? I would like to have that new doctrine of a "fairly remunerative rate" explained.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is a new doctrine. I think the proper construction of the terms used has been very thoroughly established by the courts.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It has not been in the acts.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think you can take any of the cases where this question has gone before the courts, and they have held that the railroad companies have a right to impose such a charge as will enable them to meet their fixed charges, to pay operating expenses, and earn a reasonable sum on the money invested.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not think the gentleman quite understood me. I do not agree with him. I do not believe that "fairly remunerative" means confiscatory. I believe that a rate may not be confiscatory and still that the courts may hold it is not "fairly remunerative" under that language, and that is the proposition I desire light on.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think the gentleman's contention is right in that. I think the doctrine is very well settled, as I stated a moment ago. I think the holding will be that a confiscatory rate is not fairly remunerative, and a fairly remunerative rate is a reasonable one and is nonconfiscatory.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, now will the gentleman not answer my inquiry of some time ago, as to whether he considers that the court in reviewing the action of the Commission can pass upon the question of fact, decided by the Commission, as to what is a reasonable rate, or can it only set aside a rate on the ground that it is confiscatory?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is my understanding of this bill, I will state to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understand the gentleman, then, he thinks the court can not set a rate aside unless it be confiscatory?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think so; or unless the Commission exceeds the power under which it is created.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, but I do not want the gentleman to qualify.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then I shall stand on the other proposition. I think both of them are involved, but in order to accommodate myself to the interrogatory, I shall stand on the proposition that the court can not annul a finding of this Commission unless the rate fixed by the Commission is either extortionate or confiscatory. That is the way I want it to be. If we have not got it fixed in that way, we have not enacted our intention.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. In other words, the railroads have the same right of appeal to the courts under the constitutional provision that they would have if no power of appeal were given in this bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. Surely.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman consider that he has provided for a judicial review in the ordinary sense of that term?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, no; I do not think it is necessary for us to do it at all. It is a right fixed in the courts that can not be taken away by legislative enactment. We have simply said in some particulars how these appeals to the court shall be made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I pass to another phase of this question. I desire to discuss briefly, passing away from the political aspects of it, the law as I conceive it to be involved in this piece of legislation. Many sincere men have expressed doubt as to the constitutional power of Congress to vest in the Commission the power to revise railroad rates, and where a rate is found to be unreasonable to substitute for it a reasonable rate. The legal ability of these gentlemen and their evident sincerity entitle their views to great consideration. I am one of those who believe that the question has already been adjudicated and decided in favor of the contention of those who think Congress has such power.

I propound this proposition: That this bill confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission powers that can be upheld under the Constitution of the United States; and in support of that I desire to call the attention of the House to two or three cases. In the first place, I desire to call attention to the case of Stone v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, reported in 116 United States. The contention was made a few moments ago by my distinguished friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], and other gentlemen upon the floor have suggested the matter to me, that in one of the sections of this bill we empower the Commission to hear a complaint of an unreasonable rate, and if they find it to be unreasonable to substitute a reasonable rate for it; and he contends that that provision is unconstitutional. One of my friends on the floor suggested this to me in private conversation. He said:

> I concede the fact that under the Constitution of the United States you can give to the Commission the general rate-fixing power and authorize them to go out and fix rates upon all the railroads in the United States, but I deny the proposition that you can confer upon the Commission the power to hear a complaint of a rate, and, if it finds it to be unreasonable, substitute it with a reasonable rate, upon the ground that it would be an attempt to combine in one tribunal both the administrative and the judicial functions.

Now, I think I can answer that question satisfactorily. In the Stone case there was involved the constitutionality of the Mississippi commission law. In section 9 of that law they made this provision:

Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said Commission to hear complaints made by any person against such tariff of rates so approved, on the ground that the same in any respect is for more than just compensation, or that such charges, or any of them, amount to or operate so as to effect unjust discrimination; such complaint must be in writing and specify the items in the tariff against which complaint is made; and if it appears to the Commission that there may be justice in the complaint, or that the matter ought to be investigated, the Commission shall forthwith furnish the person or corporation operating the railroad a copy of the complaint, together with notice, which said notice shall be served as other legal process is now required by law to be served on railroad companies, that at a time and place stated in the notice the tariff as to said items will be revised by the Commission, and at such time and place it shall be the duty of the Commission to hear the parties to the controversy in person or by counsel, or both, and such evidence as may be offered, oral or in writing, and may examine witnesses on oath, conforming to the mode of proceedings, as nearly as may be convenient, to that required of arbitrators, giving such time and latitude to each side and regulating the opening and conclusion of any argument as the Commission may consider best adapted to arrive at the truth; and when the hearing is concluded the Commission shall give notice of any change deemed proper by them to be made to the person or corporation operating the railroad.

Now, there is a distinct effort to empower the Mississippi State railway commission with the right to hear complaint, receive testimony at the hearing, and to have argument and render judgment. Now, let us go a step farther. On page 323 of this report is a portion of the brief of counsel for the appellee in that case, in which they assail the commission law of Mississippi upon the identical ground that it violated the State constitution in that it attempted to combine in that tribunal both legislative and judicial functions, and in support of their position they quote:

Article 1, section 12, of the constitution of the State of Mississippi provides that "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." Article 3, sections 1 and 2, of that constitution provides: "That the powers of the government of the State of Mississippi shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them confided to a separate magistracy, to wit, those which are legislative to one, those which are judicial to another, and those which are executive to another. No person, or collection of persons, being one of these departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted."

This case, then, certainly, directly, pertinently, and plainly presents the very proposition upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts has attacked this bill.

Now, on page 336 in the opinion the court disposes of that question. First let us state the question. Here was a law which attempted to convey to the Mississippi State commission a right to hear complaint and render judgment. Here was the constitution of Mississippi that forbade the conferring upon any one person or collection of persons more than one character of powers, that you could not give to them both judicial and legislative powers. Now, the supreme court of Mississippi rendered judgment that section 9 of the State law, which I have just read, was not a violation of the constitution of the State of Mississippi. When the question reached the Supreme Court of the United States, in an opinion by Chief Justice Waite, that court rendered this opinion:

The supreme court of Mississippi has decided in the cases of Railroad Commission v. Yazoo and Mississippi Railroad Company and Railroad Commission v. Natchez, Jackson and Columbia Railroad Company, not yet officially reported, that the statute is not repugnant to the constitution of the State "in that it creates a commission and charges it with the duty of supervising railroads." To this we agree, and that is all that need be decided in this case.

Now, by parity of reasoning, if that section 9 of the State law was not in violation of the clause of the State constitution that forbade the combining in one tribunal legislative and judicial functions, then certainly this bill does not violate the letter or the spirit of the Federal Constitution when it gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to hear complaint of an unreasonable rate and to grant relief by substituting in its place a reasonable one.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Was there anything in the decision that indicates the decision of the Supreme Court was merely adhering to the interpretation of the State constitution of Mississippi, which had been adopted by the court of last resort of that State?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think not. I think I understand what the gentleman is getting at; that is, in the construing of a State constitution a Federal court will follow the supreme court of the State; but that question is not in here. They were deciding a simple cast-iron question, whether the Mississippi law violated the Mississippi constitution in attempting to combine in one tribunal legislative and judicial functions, and they held it did not. Now, in Reagan v. The Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, reported in 154 United States, the Supreme Court reviewed the constitutionality of the Texas commission law, which authorizes that State commission to hear complaints of railway rates and determine them. First I will say, by way of introduction, that most of the opinion in the Reagan case was directed to the question whether the suit of the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company against the Texas railway commission, known as the "Reagan case," was a suit against the State, and therefore violative of the eleventh amendment to the Federal Constitution. When they passed from this jurisdictional fact they said there can be no doubt of the general power of the State to regulate fares and freights which may be charged or received by railroads or other carriers, and that these regulations can be carried on by means of a commission. Mark the language, Mr. Chairman:

Such a commission is merely an administrative board created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislation.

Now, I make that in reply to the contention of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] who addressed us a short while ago. I answer him by quoting decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States of recent date. In both of these cases, Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court of the United States has distinctly held that the conferring of such a power upon a State railway commission was not tantamount to the delegation of legislative authority. Surely, then, by parity of reasoning, if that power can be conferred by a State legislature upon a State commission, we in this body can confer the power upon an interstate commission to regulate interstate commerce. Why, sir, where do we find this power to take the action we propose to take in this bill. It is in two clauses of the Constitution, one clause saying that Congress has the power—to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

The other clause says that Congress shall have the power—to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department thereof.

Upon these two provisions of the Constitution hang all the law and the prophets so far as our right to regulate interstate commerce is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, some of the law writers have styled this last paragraph that I quoted as the "great coefficient power of Congress," and that coefficient power has met with construction by the Supreme Court of the United States, a construction to which I want to invite the attention of the House. In the early case of McCulloch v. Maryland Chief Justice Marshall, in one of the most luminous opinions rendered by that remarkable man, used this language:

We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution which enables that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate; let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Now, in the later case of the United States v. Fisher, reported in 2 Cranch, Chief Justice Marshall used this language:

Congress must possess the choice of means, and must be empowered to use any means which are in fact conducive to the exercise of the power granted by the Constitution.

In the Legal Tender cases, in 110 United States, Judge Gray used this language:

By the settled construction and only reasonable interpretation of this clause, the words "necessary and proper" are not limited to such measures as are absolutely and indispensably necessary, without which the powers granted must fail of execution; but they include all appropriate means which are conducive or adapted to the end to be accomplished and which in the judgment of Congress will most advantageously affect it.

Now, sir, the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States has been held by the Supreme Court to be as absolute as the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden the doctrine was announced, which was emphasized in the case of the Gloucester Ferry Company v. Pennsylvania, that this power to regulate means the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be conducted—that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted. The power of Congress to regulate commerce was one of the great causes that produced the constitutional convention of 1787. In my judgment, that convention would not have been called but for the lack of this power under the old Articles of Confederation. In my judgment that Constitution would not have been ratified but for the lack of this power, and we are bound to presume that the framers of the Constitution intended a regulation which would be effective.

The Constitution they framed was not made for a day, but made for all the rapidly changing conditions of a great and progressive people. It was intended to cover the commerce of the people as it existed when that Constitution was ordained, and also intended to cover the commerce of the country as it exists to-day, with its nearly $2,000,000,000 gross receipts of revenue, with its almost 2,000,000,000 tons of freight traffic, moving over 217,000 miles of railway. Why, sir, if I be right in this contention—that a regulation which was effective was intended—then I believe I can assert safely the doctrine that Congress in its collective capacity can not exercise the power of regulation conferred. Why? Because the membership of this body is too large; its times of meeting are too infrequent; its method of transacting business is not suited to effective regulation under this power conferred by the Constitution. I stand upon this proposition: That when the legislative authority has prescribed the rules by which the regulation of railway rates shall be made by the Commission—that is, when Congress declares that all rates shall be reasonable and that all unreasonable rates shall be prohibited, then that the Commission will be performing but an administrative function in carrying out the expressed will of the legislature as contained in the act of its creation, where by its order it substitutes a reasonable railway rate for one which is excessive or exorbitant.

Mr. CONNER. I desire to interrupt the gentleman to ask him if he has had his attention called to what is known as the "Interstate Commerce Case?"

Mr. RUSSELL. In 167 United States?

Mr. CONNER. Yes; and this language——

Mr. RUSSELL. I am going to discuss that case now.

Mr. CONNER. And this language in the opinion of Judge Brewer:

> In the early case of Thatcher v. Delaware and Hudson Canal Company (1 Interstate Commerce Commission Rept., 152, 156), a case heard and decided in July of the year in which the Commission was created, the Commission declined, for lack of evidence, to fix certain rates, saying: "It is, therefore, impossible to fix them in this case, even if the Commission had power to make rates generally, which it has not. Its power in respect to rates is to determine whether those which the roads impose are for any reason in conflict with the statute."

I ask the gentleman if he does not construe that language as concerning the action of the Commission in that suit that it did not have the power to fix the rates?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think not, if the gentleman was reading the case I had in mind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was the initiation of rates that they were talking about.

Mr. RUSSELL. This is the portion of the opinion which I will now quote substantiating the proposition I have been discussing, that we have a right to delegate to this Commission the administrative function of declaring what shall be an unreasonable rate and substituting for it a reasonable rate. It is found in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission against Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company, in 167 United States. I read from the opinion by Judge Brewer:

> Before the passage of the act it was generally believed that there were great abuses in railroad management and railroad transportation, and the grave question which Congress had to consider was how those abuses should be corrected and what control should be taken of the business of such corporations. The present inquiry is limited to the question as to what it determined should be done with reference to the matter of rates. There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates; or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty; or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that opinion is the law, surely the power attempted to be conferred in this bill in giving to a subordinate tribunal the right, when a rate is complained of and found to be unreasonable, to substitute for it a reasonable rate, found so by the Commission, would certainly run the gauntlet of judicial scrutiny in any court in the land.

Mr. MARTIN. Right at that point I should like to ask the gentleman what, in his opinion, is the nature of this power that we are conferring upon the Commission by this bill? Is it legislative?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think so.

Mr. MARTIN. Judicial or administrative?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think it is administrative.

Mr. MARTIN. Administrative purely?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think so. I have warrant for that in the opinion I read to the House a moment ago in the case of Reagan against Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, when they used the term distinctly that it is an administrative function performed by the Commission.

Mr. HOGG. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. HOGG. Is the gentleman familiar with the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Company, 167 United States, page 499——

Mr. RUSSELL. I have the book before me and have just read an extract from the opinion to the House.

Mr. HOGG. Where the court said this:

> It is one thing to inquire whether the rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable. That is a judicial act——

Mr. RUSSELL. I am aware of that language.

Mr. HOGG (reading)—

> But an entirely different thing to prescribe rates which shall be charged in the future. That is a legislative act.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am aware of that language in that opinion, and I do not see anything in this case that calls for the use of that particular term. I do not want to charge that an opinion emanating from so eminent an authority is dictum, but I do not see anything in the case or in the facts of it that required the use of that term. I sincerely believe that when the courts are directly confronted with this question, as they will be, perhaps, under this bill, that they will hold distinctly when the question is presented that the functions performed by the Commission are administrative and not legislative.

Mr. Chairman, I hurry along to another portion of this discussion. Suppose it be taken for granted that we have the right to vest in the Commission the authority to substitute a reasonable for an unreasonable rate; then is there any necessity for this legislation? That is an important inquiry that ought to be solved by the House. Let us go back once more to what is really proposed to be done. It is not to give the Commission a general rate-fixing power, it is not to engage in political rate fixing, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] said, but it is, after hearing by the Commission, to substitute an unreasonable rate with a reasonable one. Is there any necessity for the granting of that power? Let us see.

Upon what theory are our American institutions founded? When our fathers announced the doctrine that man is capable of self-government, they announced a doctrine that fell with startling effect upon the ears of monarchical Europe; but I contend, sir, that they never intended in that declaration to announce the doctrine of individualism. They intended to declare that we were capable of proclaiming a system of laws to meet emergencies as they arose. They intended to proclaim the doctrine that we were able to establish a system of government to which every citizen in the land, when aggrieved, could approach with a confiding faith that a remedy, prompt, just, and effective, would be given. That is what we mean by our American system. I assert the proposition, that where a transportation company fixes an unjust charge the shipping public has no remedy except to secure a change in the rate. You tell me you will point the aggrieved shipper to the courts.

Why, the impracticability of the remedy renders it absolutely ineffective. In thousands of the cases the amount of the overcharge would not justify the expense of the litigation, but the sum total of them all will swell into an enormous amount. Therefore there is no remedy except a change of rate. Why, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] this afternoon discussed the question of rebates and discriminations. That question has practically been provided for. The shipper and the middleman are interested in the law against rebates and discriminations, but the producer and the consumer are the people who are interested in the question whether a rate is extortionate or reasonable. They are the people who are interested.

It is no answer to me to say that the rates in this country are now reasonable. I believe the great body of them are reasonable, but that there are many, many specific instances where they are unreasonable. The time was when a great many of them were unreasonable, and the railroad companies have more power now than they had then.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] compared the American rates with European rates. Well, the rates in Europe are higher, but he failed to tell the House the reason why they are higher. As I understand it, they have no such system of express charges in European countries; it is all freight. Freight that goes by express at high rates here goes by freight there. In the second place, all the low-grade tonnage is transported by rivers and canals in Europe, while with us it goes over the railroads. In the third place, their system provides for delivery at both ends of the line, both from the consignor to the railroad company and from the railroad company to the consignee, and this delivery charge is reckoned as part of the freight charge. This is according to the testimony before the Senate committee by men who profess to know. In the fourth place, the capitalization of their roads is over $200,000 a mile, while of ours the highest amount stated is $65,000 a mile. These things render rates higher there than they are here.

Then the gentleman stated that the wages of labor are better here than they are there. That is true, but there is an average of about five men on an American railway to the mile of road, whereas in Europe there are twenty men to the mile of road. [Applause.] In other words, for this excess of price which the American laborer gets the American laborer performs the work of four or five European laborers. These facts explain why freight rates in Europe are higher than they are in America and why the wages of railway employees are lower there than they are here.

But, Mr. Chairman, these American railway rates have not always been as low as they are now. Formerly they were much higher, and, as I said a moment ago, the railways are possessed of much more power now than they had then. Now their capitalization runs over thirteen thousand million dollars and they employ nearly 2,000,000 persons. During the last few years this enormous wealth and power has been combined in the hands of a few men. Both of these gentlemen who addressed the House against this bill contended that the law of competition ought to regulate these railways. Why, sir, we have no law of competition now. It is a maxim of railway economics that wherever combination is possible competition is impossible [applause], and through the consolidation of these railways in the hands of a few men, as Philip said about the great Napoleon, competition has fled from them as from the glance of destiny.

Now, I will not rest by simply making the assertion—I will submit the proof. In the hearing before the Senate committee, early in that hearing, Mr. Sam Cowan, of Fort Worth, Tex., a lawyer of ability and a man of high character, makes the statement that there are sixty railroads running into the city of St. Louis; that they had a general office, with a secretary and a rate clerk, but that they kept no minutes; that they denied that there was any combination between them, but the fact existed that when one of these sixty roads published a rate on one day that identical day the other fifty-nine published the same rate. This statement went into the printed record before the Senate committee.

Shortly after that Mr. Hooker made a statement that there were four men that fixed all the rates west of the Missouri River; that four other men fixed all of them north of the Ohio and the Potomac, and that four others fixed the rates south of those rivers. In other words, twelve men in the United States fixed the rates of the railways of the United States. Judge Clements, a distinguished member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, placed before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee this statement, to which I now invite the careful attention of the House. It is a report of conditions prevailing in the Pennsylvania Railway system. It shows how the power of directorship has been combined in the hands of a few men in that system.

For example, he shows that 157 directorships were held by 157 persons on one board only; 63 directorships were held by 26 persons on from two to five boards; 175 directorships were held by 13 persons on more than five boards; and then he proceeds to show how the capital stock is distributed in these railway companies—the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Pennsylvania Company, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, the Norfolk and Western Railway Company, the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, and the Northern Central Railway Company. It is a statement so instructive and suggestive that I shall read it to the House:

Report for the year ending June 30, 1904.

Capital stock outstanding:
Pennsylvania Railroad Company	$296,504,550
Pennsylvania Company	40,000,000
Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company	184,244,812
Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company	62,799,400
Norfolk and Western Railway Company	89,000,000
Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company	23,494,575
Northern Central Railway Company	11,462,300
Of the stock of the Pennsylvania Company	40,000,000
Pennsylvania Railroad Company owned	40,000,000
Of the stock of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company	184,244,812
Pennsylvania Railroad Company owned	51,773,300
Pennsylvania Company owned	16,044,600
Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company owned	1,781,500
Northern Central Railway Company owned	1,781,500
Of the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company	$62,799,400
Pennsylvania Railroad Company owned	10,130,000
Pennsylvania Company owned	4,000,000

It appears that the members of the boards of directors of certain railway companies, mostly in the Pennsylvania Railroad system, as given in their reports for the year ending June 30, 1904, aggregated 395. An analysis of this number shows that 157 directorships were held by 157 persons on one board only; 63 directorships were held by 26 persons on from two to five boards; 175 directorships were held by 13 persons on more than five boards, distributed as follows:

1 person held	24
1 person held	17
1 person held	14
1 person held	14
1 person held	13
1 person held	8
1 person held	8
1 person held	7
13 persons held	175

This shows how the Pennsylvania Railroad system has absorbed the capital stock and power of these other roads, and as a consequence has broken down and destroyed whatever competition prevailed among them. That the public has been the sufferer, who can doubt?

But let us go further. My distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] quoted from Hadley's Railway Transportation. I take it, therefore, that he can not impeach his own witness. If he does, I shall object. Well, now, here is what President Hadley, of Yale, says about this question of consolidation:

> And the present age is one of industrial monopoly, however we may shut our eyes to the fact. We have not free competition, nor can we expect to have it in the future. Instead of moving toward it, we are moving away from it. This is a fact to which people are just beginning to open their eyes. They begin to see in a great many cases prices are determined not by competition but by combination. * * * On either side of the Atlantic most persons who have really looked into the subject have come to regard railroads as a sort of natural monopoly, not regulated by the ordinary laws of trade, and needing to be closely watched by public authority.

Now, against Mr. McCALL'S witness, Hadley, I quote Hadley on the subject to show that the law of competition has now been eliminated from the railroad problem. If that be so, what other law shall control them except some such law as we provide for in this case? Why, Senator NEWLANDS made the statement, and printed it in the Senate hearings, that over 200,000 miles of railways in the United States were combined in six groups, and that a few men, and sometimes one man, dominated those groups. This testimony of these gentlemen who testified before the Senate Committee is not only not denied, but corroborated by the railway companies.

Mr. Bond, of the Baltimore and Ohio, and Mr. Harris and Mr. Lincoln, of the Missouri Pacific, all three say that great consolidation of railways has taken place; that competition was practically eliminated; Mr. Bond saying it was the result of the Sherman antitrust act, and the other gentlemen saying that it had taken place, but that the public had been the gainer by it. This testimony of these railway witnesses is corroborated by Mr. Walker D. Hinds, of the Nashville and Chattanooga; by Mr. Morawetz, of the Santa Fe; by Mr. Ramsay, of the Wabash, and by Mr. Tuttle, of the Boston and Maine, all corroborating these gentlemen when they say that this railroad combination has taken place by which competition has been eliminated. Therefore we have now no law of trade, no law of economics, by which these matters of railway rates can be controlled, and we are compelled to resort to legislation of this character in the interests of the consumers and the producers of this country. Well, what has been the effect of this combination? Let us see. In 1899 the tendency of railway rates to be reduced was arrested by the elimination of the law of competition, and since then railway rates have been on a steady advance. Just in this connection I call the attention of the House to a table contained in a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the United States Senate bearing on this question of the advance in freight rates.

Number of tons of freight carried, freight revenue, and average rate per ton for years ending June 30, 1899–1903.

Year ending June 30—	Tons of freight carried.	Total freight revenue.	Average rate per ton.
1899	959,763,583	$913,737,155	$0.9520
1900	1,101,680,238	1,049,256,323	.9524
1901	1,089,226,440	1,118,543,014	1.0269
1902	1,200,315,787	1,207,228,845	1.0058
1903	1,221,475,948	1,318,320,604	1.0793

The rate in 1899—that is, the average rate per ton, was 95.20 cents. In 1900 it was 95.24 cents. In 1891 it was $1.0269. In 1902 it was $1.0258, a slight reduction in the average rate per ton, which is accounted for by the fact of the enormous increase in the low-grade tonnage of that year. In 1903 it was $1.0793 per ton. Now, further along in this same communication from the Commission is another table, showing how the earnings of the roads have been increased by this advance in rates. I here call the attention of the House to that table:

Statement showing the total number of tons of freight carried by the railroads of the United States for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903, with the total revenue accruing therefrom; also the revenue which would have accrued at the average rate of 95.2 cents per ton for the years ending June 30, 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903, this being the average rate for the year ending June 30, 1899; and the increase in the revenue for the years 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903 resulting from the increase in the average rate per ton for those years.

Year ending June 30—	Tons of freight carried.	Total freight revenue as charged.	Amount of freight revenue at average rate per ton of 95.2 cents, being the average rate for the year ending June 30, 1899.	Increase.
1900	1,101,680,238	1,049,256,323	1,048,799,587	$456,736
1901	1,089,226,440	1,118,543,014	1,036,943,571	81,599,443
1902	1,200,315,787	1,207,228,845	1,142,700,629	64,528,216
1903[a]	1,221,475,948	1,318,320,604	1,162,845,102	155,475,502

[a] The figures given for the year 1903 represent about 98 per cent of the total mileage.

This table shows what the earnings would have been had the 1899 rate of 95.20 per ton been in force, and what the earnings actually were through the advance in rates. For instance, in 1900 there was an advance in earnings of $456,730; in 1901 there was an advance of $81,599,443; in 1902 of $64,528,216, and in 1903—and they only had the figures for 98 per cent of the railroad mileage—the average advance in earnings was $155,475,502. All this shows the effect of the elimination of the law of competition. Who paid that, Mr. Chairman? Why, these people in this country whom this bill is designed to protect. But, sir, I place the right to the relief contained in this bill upon another proposition that I do not believe can be assailed. Whatever gentlemen may think about this question, there is a large element in this country that believes these rates are unfair. The memorials which this body and its individual members have received from State legislatures, from municipal corporations, from individual shippers, convince us that a large number of people in the United States believe these rates are unfair. Mr. Chairman, these people are not anarchists who believe this. They are not communists, they are not enemies of wealth, or of the railroad companies, but they are patriotic citizens of the United States.

Now, independent of the proposition as to whether they are right or wrong, they think they are right. What shall we do? Shall we organize a sworn tribunal without interest in the subject-matter of the controversy to decide whether they are right or wrong or shall we force them to leave the decision of that question to the people who exact the charge and who are the beneficiaries of the situation? [Applause.] I say that the latter proposition shocks the moral sense and is contrary to every doctrine of Americanism. We Americans force no man to submit his grievance, either real or fancied, to his adversary. Why, Mr. Chairman, no one here wants to harm the railroads. I recognize what splendid properties they are and how much they have had to do with the development of the country. They have touched with their iron fingers the deserts in the West and made them to blossom as the rose.

The gleaming eyes of their locomotives have gazed into the face of savagery, and churches and schools and contented people now inhabit the places where the red man hunted the buffalo; but, sir, while the railroads have benefited the people, the people have benefited the railroads. [Applause.] To tell me to the contrary would remind me of an anecdote related of old Ethan Allen after the battle of Ticonderoga, when he attended church and heard the parson pray very unctuously, thanking the Lord for the great victory of the American forces. Then Ethan got up and said:

Parson, it is all right to give the Lord praise for this victory, but the next time you pray along this line I just want you to mention that Ethan Allen was there also.

[Applause.]

So while the railroads have benefited the people the people have benefited the railroads. Why, look at the magnificent land bonuses which they have received. Ex-Governor Larabee makes the statement that—

The various grants made to the railroads comprise no less than 300,000 square miles of land, equal to four and a half times the area of New England, or six times that of the State of New York, or equal to the total area of Iowa, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio.

That is the amount of land grants they have received. Why, in Texas we gave them 16 sections to the mile, with 640 acres to the section, and in their greed they actually took it for switches and sidings, not content with taking it for the main line, until we threw them down and took it away from them when James S. Hogg was governor.

Mr. MACON. Does the gentleman believe the development of government was ever the primary cause for the laying of a single railroad track in this country?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know. I will say this: I presume the men who built the railroads intended to make money, but I do not want to make any assault on the gentlemen who built the railroads. I believe they are a splendid and patriotic body of the people, but they are men like we are, of like passions as ourselves. It would be unfair to let the shipper fix the rate, because, being interested, he would make it too low, and it is also unfair to let the carrier fix the rate, because, being interested, the carrier would make it too high, and the common-sense thing to do is to let some tribunal not interested in the result fix the rate, which will do even-handed justice between the people and the railroads. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I come from a section of this Union that is tremendously interested in this proposition. Three years ago that portion of Texas which I represent, my immediate section of it, shipped 5,000 cars of fruit and vegetables to the northern and eastern markets. The business has tremendously increased since then. Now, you can not carry on that business without the use of refrigerator cars. The way that is done is this: The ice is deposited in bunkers at each end of the car. I am advised by reliable authority that ice can be deposited in the bunkers of the car at from $2.50 to $3 a ton. Suppose a car of fruit starts from Tyler, Tex., to St. Louis. St. Louis is thirty-six hours from Tyler. They will start that car of peaches or tomatoes with 3 tons of ice. They will put on, say, 2 tons more at Texarkana and, if it be necessary, they will put on 2 tons more at some other point between Texarkana and St. Louis, making 7 tons in all, yet the refrigerator charge from Tyler to St. Louis is $60. Now, I have here these refrigerator charges, and I want to call the attention of the committee very briefly to some glaring inequalities in these refrigerator rates. For instance, it costs as much to ship a car of fruit or vegetables or anything else requiring refrigeration from a Texas point to Washington as it does to New Haven, Conn. It costs as much to Washington as it does to Helena, Mont.; as much as it does to Butte, Mont.; as much as it does to Portland, Me.; as much as it does to Montreal, Canada; as much as it does to Toronto, Canada, or to Winnipeg.

The icing charges are not fixed on a distance basis, but on a purely arbitrary basis. It costs as much to ship a car to Zanesville, Ohio, as it does to Allegheny, Pa., and it costs as much to Cleveland, Ohio, as it does to Winona, Minn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the gentleman referring purely to icing charges?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am referring to icing charges.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And not to transportation charges?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, indeed; purely icing charges. It costs as much to Columbus, Ohio, as it does to St. Paul, Minn.; it costs as much to Dayton, Ohio, as it does to Detroit, Mich., and it costs as much to Cincinnati, Ohio, as it does to Cedar Rapids, Iowa.; it costs as much to Indianapolis, Ind., as it does to Milwaukee, Wis.; and it costs as much to Davenport, Iowa, as it does to Hannibal, Mo. I might show you other glaring inconsistencies. I also have here——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL] yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can the gentleman tell us whether they charge as much for ice in the winter as they do in summer? [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSSELL. I suppose so. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, I have here a schedule of freight rates. Let me tell you this about them: If a tomato raiser in my State wants to ship tomatoes he gets a minimum weight of 20,000 pounds to the car for transportation charges, outside of the icing charges. If he is a peach raiser, and ships east of the Mississippi River, he pays on a minimum of 24,000 pounds to the car. In other words, the peach raiser, shipping in the same kind of a car as the tomato raiser—and these fruits are about the same, the same number of crates will go in a car, and they sell for about the same price—if that peach raiser ships east of the Mississippi River they will make him pay for 4,000 pounds more of freight than they do the tomato grower. Why? They have been talking to you something about "all the traffic will bear." The reason of it is manifest. If you put the rate too high on the tomato raiser, he will not plant next year, but the peach grower can not afford to take his ax and go into the orchard and cut down the trees that bear the fruit. Therefore they take advantage of his condition to thumbscrew the peach raiser because they know he is bound to stand it.

Now, let us go a little further into this thing. Here are the tomato rates, which are on the 20,000-pound-car basis. The rate to Aurora, Ill., is 47 cents a hundred on tomatoes, whereas to Burlington, Iowa, it is only 44 cents a hundred on tomatoes. The rate to Danville, Ill., is 47 cents a hundred, while the rate to Davenport, Iowa, is only 44 cents a hundred.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. From what point?

Mr. RUSSELL. From any Texas point. I am glad the gentleman asked me that question, because my statement might have been somewhat obscure without it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would the gentleman suggest that rates ought to be based upon a mileage basis?

Mr. RUSSELL. Not altogether. I think that ought to be a factor in it. But I would not undertake to go into that, because I think this Commission ought to be composed of men who know more about rates than either myself or the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] or any other Member of the House. I do not mean that as a reflection on my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand. Does not the gentleman believe that reason for the difference between the long and short hauls has always or, rather, has usually been an economic condition that must confront anyone fixing rates, whether it be a commission or a traffic manager?

Mr. RUSSELL. As to that I want to say this—and I am glad the gentleman mentioned that subject—I thought this bill ought to be amended so as to restore the vitality of the long and short haul clause. I believe that somebody ought to be empowered to suspend the operation of the long and short haul clause where the conditions of the case or the economic conditions require it, as the gentleman suggests; but I do not believe that the tremendous power of suspending this law ought to be left with the railroads, where it practically has been left since these decisions of the court upon the subject were made, but I believe the power of suspension ought to be vested alone in the Commission. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Has it not been a fact that as a result of the making of a cheap rate over a long distance, which is practically an American practice, we have widened the zone of sale in which products of any section can be marketed?

Mr. RUSSELL. Possibly so, and I say that that power ought to be continued in the Commission and not in the railroads. Now, going back to these transportation rates on fruits, I would like to read you the rate on a carload of peaches from Tyler, Tex., to Aurora, Ill. It is 59 cents a hundred to Aurora on a minimum of 20,000 pounds and 73 cents to Akron, Ohio, on a minimum of 24,000 pounds. It was 59 cents to Chicago on a minimum of 20,000 pounds and 73 cents to Canton, Ohio, on a minimum of 24,000. It was 73 cents to Cleveland, Ohio, on a minimum of 24,000 and only 50 cents to Emporia, Kans., on a minimum of 20,000 pounds. I might show these inconsistencies more glaringly by putting these rate sheets in the RECORD, but the instances I have given illustrate the principle. But, Mr. Chairman, the best way to exhibit these things is to look at them in the concrete, and I have brought to this discussion some individual shipping expense bills that are startling in their facts.

On the 8th day of May a firm at Tyler, Tex., known as Wilcy & Henry, shipped 516 crates of strawberries to a firm in Burlington, Iowa. That car sold for $460. Of this sum, $46 was retained by the commission people as commission, $225 represented transportation charges, and the shippers got $189.

Now, let me call your attention to two more cases.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How much would that be a quart?

Mr. RUSSELL. I have not made the calculation.

On the 22d day of July the Woldert Grocery Company, at Tyler, Tex., shipped a carload of fruit to Chicago. It was a car of mixed fruit. It sold at Chicago for $269.52. Of this amount the commission people retained $7.50. The transportation companies got $205.69 and the shippers received $55.33. In July of last year the Woldert Grocery Company, of Tyler, Tex., shipped a carload of fruit to Buffalo, N. Y. It sold in Buffalo for $400.90. The transportation companies got $258.40; the drayage charge was $8.64; the commission was $28.06, and the shipper got $105.08.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, from the close study that he has evidently given this subject, whether he regards these as usual or exceptional cases that he has given?

Mr. RUSSELL. I have quite a number of these expense bills. I have just picked these out of the expense bills I had. I think they are exceptions, but there is not one of all the bills I have that did not, at least in some degree, show the extortionate charges.

Mr. MARTIN. Is it not quite likely that there might have been surrounding circumstances—such as the condition of the market or damaged fruit—that might have affected the price?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is not a question of the price of the fruit; but, as suggested to me by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], these instances show that the companies have the power to do just what they have done, as shown in these bills of expense.

Mr. MARTIN. But this is what I am trying to get at: Whether it was a part of the usual operation. Do you regard these as cases in which exceptional high prices were charged by the companies, or whether they were the usual prices?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, the transportation prices were the usual prices.

Mr. MARTIN. What I am trying to get at is whether these were exceptional cases and the charge affected the price of the product because these charges were exceptional.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think the car sold at Buffalo was the usual price.

Mr. MARTIN. Can the gentleman give us a statement as to his opinion whether these are exceptional rather than usual cases?

Mr. RUSSELL. Of all the expense bills I have they would differ simply in degree. I have picked out those that I had which I thought would glaringly show this injustice; but there is not one in all the number, I will say to the gentleman, that did not show that the extortion differed only in degree.

Mr. ALEXANDER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman gave one bill for the shipment of a carload of fruit to Buffalo, N. Y.?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Did the gentleman find any bill where a less price was charged by a railroad company for shipping fruit?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think not. I think the price was the same.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hurry to a conclusion, because I have now detained the House beyond its patience undoubtedly, and almost beyond my own strength.

Each of these cases that I have had here, and read to the House, is a case where the producer has paid the freight; and the producer always pays the freight wherever he can not fix the price of his product in the market. Wherever that condition prevails the producer always pays the freight.

It is the producers of this country who are complaining of the situation of affairs that now prevails. The producer has been the most patient of all the classes in this country. He has stood aside while others have received relief and has rarely complained.

He generally quietly shoulders his burdens. It may be that these people have not complained because their lives have been too much filled with toil to leave them time to investigate.

But they are complaining now. Wrought to a pitch of indignation by years of wrong they are now demanding relief. It is the producer who is demanding it—the cattlemen of the West, the farmers of the South and great Middle West, the fruit growers of California, of Florida, Georgia, and Texas. They are the people who pride themselves upon our national power and grandeur.

The producer is entitled to our consideration. The agricultural producer is the man who converted this country from a borrower nation into a lender nation. It was of the producer that Mr. Secretary Wilson said that in the last sixteen years he had wiped out an adverse trade balance of $543,000,000 and had piled up five thousand million dollars to the international trade credits of the country. [Applause]. The producer does not believe that a fair share of this stupendous sum has remained in his hands. He knows he has labored, he knows he has made wealth, he knows he has economized, and now he comes to this body and asks us under the Constitution to exercise such efficient regulatory powers over the transportation companies as will protect him from rapacity and extortion. He has a right to ask it. He has stood aside while others had their day in court here. This House has protected labor in the cities from competition with the Chinese. This body has listened to the demands of labor for the eight-hour law, so far as Government works are concerned. This body has listened to the railway employees, and has given them the safety-appliance law. And now the producer claims his day in court. He has made out his case on the law and the facts; and, with malice toward none and charity for all, he relies upon the inexorable logic of the facts and appeals to the integrity of the people's representatives. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VREELAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad-rate bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the announcement which I made yesterday, I object.

Mr. CURRIER. I was not aware of the announcement of the gentleman. This is just a little printing resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is after 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents shall have authority to order such printing and binding done as it may deem to be necessary, connected with the business of said committee during this Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object, Mr. Speaker. I will not object to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. CURRIER. I will call it up to-morrow.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. MILLER, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12464) for the relief of laborers, mechanics, and other employees of the United States Government injured, and the families of those killed, without fault of their own, while in the discharge of their duties; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House, under the order heretofore adopted, adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 3, 1906, at 11 a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 3, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents shall have authority to order such printing and binding done as it may deem to be necessary connected with the transaction of the business of said committee during this Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

SAN FRANCISCO MOUNTAINS FOREST RESERVE, ARIZONA.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up House resolution No. 35, and ask unanimous consent to waive the reading of the original resolution and read the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is no way of knowing whether this is a privileged resolution or not. I do not wish to waive the right to object to it if it is not.

The SPEAKER. With that reservation, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is requested to make a full report as to the facts and circumstances in connection with the formation and enlargement of the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserve, and as to the present condition of the lieu-land rights growing out of said reserve, and the particulars as to any contract for exchange of railway land and other land in such reserve.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the substitute was submitted to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], who drew the original resolution, and it is satisfactory to him. In a brief form it calls for the general information covered by the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12987, the railroad-rate bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the railroad-rate bill, with Mr. VREELAND in the chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, during the discussion on the pending bill it has become apparent that its opponents entertain divergent reasons for their antagonism to the measure. This is well illustrated in the case of the views expressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS], and the views expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY]. The former has ridiculed what he is pleased to term the child-like simplicity of the supporters of this bill, evidently a majority of the House, who believe that much public good can be accomplished by its passage. He seems to think that the measure is without any merit or efficacy. The other gentleman has treated the matter more seriously, and has predicted, if I can understand the trend of his remarks, that not only much would be accomplished in the matter of the regulation of the railroads, but that, according to his view, too much would be accomplished, and that in the end great disaster would come to the country if this bill be enacted into law. These gentlemen and the others who do not favor this legislation ought in fairness to agree whether such legislation will be futile or whether it will be good or whether destructive in its effect. Such a course would enable the friends of the measure to better consider and remedy whatever defects it may have, to the end that a futile or destructive law might not be enacted, and public good only might be accomplished.

As one of the friends of this bill, I must say that it does not contain every provision that I would like to see enacted into law for the control and regulation of railroads. That it will remedy many defects of existing law and go far toward meeting the public demand for rightful and effective regulation of the great interstate transportation corporations there can be no doubt. That it will prove harmful to any legitimate business enterprise or investment can not be maintained. It will eliminate at least some of the abuses in the management of railroads, and will greatly relieve the complaining public. In short, Mr. Chairman, while the bill could have been made better, yet, as it is, it will in the end be of much benefit to the people and will not harm legitimate business.

It is strange, Mr. Chairman, to one familiar with the legislative history of the country that the opponents of this bill should at this late day express any doubt about legislative authority to regulate by enactment common carriers. The power of the legislative branch of the Government to regulate common carriers or other business of a public or semipublic nature is a principle as old as the common law. The States possessed this power before the formation of the Federal Government and hold it now undiminished except by provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if we may refer to history, it may be said that this original plenary power of the States was one of the chief causes that led the fathers to form a more perfect union and to write the Constitution delegating to the Federal Government certain powers which the States deemed it wise to surrender for the common good of all. Ridicule can not be invoked, nor can "dire chimeras" be conjured up to frighten the timid in order to defeat the proposed legislation. The questions involved are not new and the measure itself is not revolutionary, but is in harmony with well-established legal principles and the organic law of our country. The power of Congress to pass this measure is indisputable, and the policy of such legislation accords with precedent. In many of the States of the Union it is the well-established policy to regulate common carriers engaged in commerce wholly within the States, and that policy has gone to the extent of authorizing this regulation through the medium of an administrative board called a commission.

There can be no doubt of the power of a State to control and regulate railroad rates in the matter of transportation wholly within its limits.

A corporation maintaining a public highway, although it owns the property it employs for accomplishing public objects, must be held to have accepted its rights, privileges, and franchises subject to the condition that the government creating it, or the government within whose limits it conducts its business, may by legislation protect the people against unreasonable charges for the services rendered by it. A corporation, after accepting a public franchise, can not construct a public highway simply for its own benefit, without regard to the rights of the public.

There can be no doubt of the general power of a State to regulate the fares and freights which may be charged and received by railroad or other carriers, and that this regulation can be carried on by means of a commission. Such a commission is merely an administrative board created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislation. (Railroad Commission cases, 116 U. S., 307.)

The legislature has power to fix rates, and the extent of judicial interference is protection against unreasonable rates. (Chicago & Grand Trunk Ry. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S., 339.)

In 128 U. S., 174, a case involving the validity of the Georgia Railroad Commission act, the court said:

> That this delegation of authority by the legislature to the commission to prescribe what shall be reasonable and just rates for the carriage and transportation of persons and property over the railroads within its limits was a proper exercise of its power to provide protection for its citizens against unjust rates for such transportation and to prevent unjust discriminations, and that it was expected, not that the legislature would itself make specific regulations as to what should in each case be a proper charge, but that it would simply provide the means by which such rates should be ascertained and enforced.

In 134 U. S., 467, Minnesota v. Railroad, the court said, Justice Field delivering the opinion:

> In regard to the business of common carriers limited to points within a single State, that State has the legislative power to establish the rates of compensation for such carriage.

The power which the legislature has to do this can be exercised through a commission which it may authorize to act in the matter, such as the one appointed by the legislature of Minnesota by the act now under consideration.

In the exercise of this power the following States have created commissions and clothed them with authority to regulate and fix local rates on the domestic traffic of the railroads:

GEORGIA.

Make reasonable and just rates of freight and passenger tariffs, to be observed by all railroad companies doing business in this State on the railroads thereof.

INDIANA.

Upon the failure of the railroad companies so to do, to fix and establish for all or any connecting lines of railroads in this State reasonable joint rates of freight, transfer, and switching charges for the various classes of freight and cars that may pass over two or more lines of such railroads. * * * The commission shall have power to enforce reasonable rates, tolls, or charges for all other service performed by any railroad subject hereto.

MISSISSIPPI.

The commission shall revise such of said tariffs as are not subject to the exclusive regulation of Congress, and determine whether or not, and in what particular, and of the charges are more than reasonable compensation for the services to be rendered, and whether or not discrimination be made improperly against any person, corporation, or locality; and it shall require the proper corrections to be made; and when the tariffs have been corrected, the commission shall append to each its certificate of approval; and the commission shall fix and regulate tariffs of charges for all railroads which fail to furnish their tariffs as required.

TEXAS.

The commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to fix to each class or subdivision of freight a reasonable rate for each railroad subject to this act for the transportation of each of said classes and subdivisions. * * * The said commission may fix different rates for different railroads and for different lines under the same management, or for different parts of the same line if found necessary to do justice, and may make rates for express companies different from the rates fixed for railroads.

WISCONSIN.

If upon such investigation the rate or rates, fares, charges, or classifications, or any joint rate or rates, or any regulation, practice, or service complained of, be found to be unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, or the service shall be found to be inadequate, the commission shall have power to fix and order substituted therefor such rate or rates, fares, charges, or classification as it shall have determined to be just and reasonable, and which shall be charged, imposed, and followed in the future, and shall also have power to make such orders respecting such regulations, practice, or service, as it shall have determined to be reasonable, and which shall be observed and followed in the future.

IOWA.

The board of railroad commissioners of this State are hereby empowered and directed to make for each of the railroad corporations doing business in this State, as soon as practicable, a schedule of reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of freight and cars on each of said railroads, and said power to make schedule shall include the power of classification of all such freights, and it shall be the duty of said commissioners to make such classification.

In my own State, Alabama, a commission with advisory powers has proved to be a disappointment to the public; so much so that there is no doubt that the next legislature of that State will enact an effective and comprehensive law vesting the commission with as ample powers as those possessed by the commissions in the States from whose laws I have quoted. The constitution of Alabama gives the power to the legislature to fix rates and the legislature can effectuate this power through a commission.

The Constitution confers upon Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations. This clause has been the subject of more debates, of more controversy, of more judicial decisions than any other provision in that instrument. The necessity for this power to be confided to the Federal Government was the chief cause for the formation of the United States into a Federal Government. But we may pretermit historical reference to the subject. This power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations is plenary. All the decisions of the courts sustain this construction.

In 1887 Congress passed the act commonly called the "Interstate Commerce Commission law," whereby it was intended that the Federal Government under the legislative power of Congress should regulate the great transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce, and this application of the power has received judicial sanction.

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. (167 U. S. 479) the right of Congress to confer power upon a commission to fix rates was distinctly presented. As stated by the Attorney-General in his opinion of May 5, 1905, rendered in response to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, on the subject of the power of Congress to regulate the rates of railways engaged in interstate commerce and by whom that power so far as it exists may be exercised constitutionally—> in this case the Commission had fixed a group of rates on certain railroads and ordered the railroads to readjust their tariffs so that from and after a day named they should conform to the rates thus fixed. The railroads failed to obey this order, and the Commission instituted a suit in the circuit court to compel obedience. The bill was dismissed after hearing, and on appeal to the circuit court of appeals that court certified to the Supreme Court the following question:

"Had the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdictional power to make the order hereinbefore set forth—all proceedings preceding said order being due and regular, so far as procedure is concerned?"

Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, said:

Before the passage of the act it was generally believed that there were great abuses in railroad management and railroad transportation, and the grave question which Congress had to consider was how those abuses should be corrected, and what control should be taken of the business of such corporations. The present inquiry is limited to the questions as to what it determined should be done with reference to the matter of rates. There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates; or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty; or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable (p. 494).

The question debated is whether it vested in the Commission the power and the duty to fix rates; and the fact that this is a debatable question, and has been most strenuously and earnestly debated, is very persuasive that it did not. The grant of such power is never to be implied. The power itself is so vast and comprehensive, so largely affecting the rights of carrier and shipper, as well as indirectly all commercial transactions, the language by which the power is given had been so often used and was so familiar to the legislative mind, and is capable of such definite and exact statement, that no just rule of construction would tolerate a grant of such power by mere implication. Administrative control over railroads through boards or commissions was no new thing. It had been resorted to in England and in many of the States of this Union. * * * It will be interesting to notice the provisions in the legislation of different States (pp. 494, 495, supra).

Then follow quotations from statutes of several States as to the power to fix and revise railway rates.

In Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 650) the court said, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan:

The legislature can not delegate its authority, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes or intends to make its own action depend. To deny this would stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation depends which can not be known to the lawmaking power, and must, therefore, be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.

So, Mr. Chairman, we find ourselves not confronted with any novel proposition nor face to face with any question of a revolutionary character. In our present endeavor to regulate the transportation companies we are supported by undoubted constitutional grant and by legislative precedent, and more than this, we find that this exercise of this power through the medium of an administrative board has the approval in repeated instances of the judicial department of our Government—the department which must at last in any case determine the scope and rightful use of legislative authority.

I can not enumerate in the limited time allowed me all the reasons that call for this legislation, but I will specify a few of them. Unjust discriminations practiced by these transportation companies is one reason why this legislation is demanded. The secret preferences and rebates given to favorite shippers is another reason. The unreasonable charges exacted in some cases is another reason why this legislation should be had. There can not be any doubt that it is called for by a great public demand, founded upon a multitude of reasons. Then that brings us to the consideration of this particular form of regulation of the railroads. The present bill proposes to amend existing law, which was thought to be at the time of its enactment sufficiently remedial in its nature to meet the evils complained of by a suffering public; but in the course of litigation and by judicial decisions it has been found that this original law is so defective that it can not meet the demands of the public, that it can not meet the intentions of Congress which was attempted to be expressed in the act of 1887.

I may depart from the discussion to remark that the opponents of this measure combat it and seek to defeat it, which is amendatory of an existing law and seeks to cure existing evils, but they are not fair enough to offer any remedy to meet these admitted evils. In legislating no man should interpose an objection to needed proposed legislation simply to be in opposition. He should in justice to himself and to the country go further and suggest a better remedy and better legislation to meet the great demand of the people. [Applause.] The opponents of this measure have filled their speeches with dire predictions. Not one of them has had the courage to stand up here and deny that evils are practiced by the great transportation companies of the country. Not one of them denies that secret preference and rebates are given. Not one of them denies that in many instances unreasonable charges are exacted. Not one of them denies that the secret methods whereby the great public is wronged ought to be exposed and prevented, and yet they tell us that nothing should be done; that if this bill passes it will lead on, in the development of our Government growth of transportation companies, to woeful results. What the people of this country demand is not mere criticism, is not mere predictions, but they demand immediate legislation from Congress to meet and prevent the abuses from which they suffer to-day. [Applause.]

I need not stop here to recount how slow Congress has been to accord this relief; how the great producing and shipping public has suffered all these long years, since the act of 1887 was emasculated by the decision of the Supreme Court, holding that while the Commission has the power to determine what was a reasonable and just rate, it had no power to fix a rate for the government of the transportation company in the future. The great fruit producers of California, the producers of grain, cotton, lumber, and the producers throughout the country, the small shippers, the small merchants, the consumers, have all united in their petition to the members of Congress. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the pending measure in its substantial form will not only pass this House with practical unanimity—and I believe that so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned the vote will be unanimous—but that it will pass at the other end of the Capitol; and when it does pass, I am quite sure that the present Chief Magistrate of our nation will give his approval to the enactment.

It has been suggested that the proposed form is not the proper remedy for the evils complained of by the American people. It has been suggested that the remedy ought to be through the medium of the courts. It is needless, perhaps, to say that every tyro in the law knows that so far as the Government of the United States is concerned there is no common law. It has been suggested elsewhere that Congress pass a Federal statute giving the common-law right to sue on account of unreasonable charges exacted by interstate railroads. In reply to that, I beg to say that the remedy by suit for discriminations and for overcharges is a futile remedy, and I challenge any man here to point out any case anywhere under American jurisprudence where any shipper of any commodity has recovered one cent from any railroad for extortionate charges. [Applause.] I have not been able to find such case. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the suggestion of such a remedy is to feed the people upon a false hope. If such a remedy were practical, or might result in fruits to the party who instigated the litigation, it would be an onerous duty to impose upon the average man, and would be of no practical benefit to the great mass of the people. It would be, in effect, a denial of any remedy, and it would leave free these exacting corporations merciless many times in their demand; it would have them to go unwhipped of justice in a civil remedy as well as a criminal.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would be impracticable to enforce the collection of reasonable rates through the courts, for the reason that the courts are already overcrowded with business?

Mr. CLAYTON. Undoubtedly it would.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And for another reason, that the juries and the courts as now constituted are not capable of comprehending or ascertaining what reasonable rates might be.

Mr. CLAYTON. I must say that so far as the courts and juries are concerned, they have not the time, they have not the machinery, they have not the means of ascertaining all the facts that would establish whether a rate were reasonable or unreasonable.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And is it not a further fact that the railroads are represented by the very best counsel that can be had, and they have a right to appeal through all our system of courts, and that delay would rob a man of any rights that he might have?

Mr. CLAYTON. Undoubtedly that is correct, and the delay and expenses of litigation would not only rob him of any right but it would be an effectual remedy to prevent him from attempting to assert his right.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CLAYTON. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but the remedy proposed for existing evils is the best remedy. Any remedy through the court rather than a commission would prove to be expensive and inadequate.

Under the common law a shipper claiming to be aggrieved by an unreasonable charge may maintain an action to recover back from the carrier the amount paid in excess of a reasonable rate. He can not obtain his goods without paying the charge. But an action to compel restitution affords no real remedy. The small shipper will generally lose more than he will gain by such a proceeding, even if he win his case. The large shipper will hesitate long before he enters into a controversy with the railroad in the complex matter of charges—a controversy which, regardless of result, must be expensive, and is likely to be long drawn out. And such an action settles little. The shipper who could win would recover back the comparatively small sum paid by him in excess of a reasonable charge, but nothing is accomplished for the future—and nothing is accomplished with respect to the past except in the case of that particular shipper. It is not surprising, therefore, that actions by shippers to recover amounts paid to carriers in excess of reasonable charges have been few and far between. The Supreme Court of the United States well said in the Trans-Missouri case, 166 U. S., 332:

Any individual shipper would in most cases be apt to abandon the effort to show the unreasonable character of a charge sooner than hazard the great expense in time and money necessary to prove the fact, and at the same time incur the ill will of the road itself in all his future dealings with it.

Even if the remedy at common law were adequate, it would not benefit the person or community really injured. The remedy might benefit a third party—that is, the middleman, the actual shipper who pays the freight—but it is of no particular advantage to the public generally that he recover from the railroad company the amount of the overcharge he has paid. It would not avail the producer, who has received a less price for his product on account of the freight rate, or the consumer, who has been compelled to bear the increased charge on food thereby occasioned.

In Van Patten v. Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company (81 Fed. Rep., 545) Judge Shiras said:

Furthermore, if it be true that the establishment of reasonable rates for railroad services is to be left to the verdict of juries rendered long after the services have been performed, it is apparent that it will be wholly impossible to secure equality or uniformity therein, and of necessity preferences would result therefrom in favor of individuals and localities, thus violating the most important principles of the act in question. If the plaintiff maintains this action on the theory now contended for and recovers damages in the sum of $50,000 or thereabouts, this will have the same effect upon the shipment counted on in the petition as though the company should now allow a rebate for that amount; and these shipments will secure an advantage over all others made along the line, and upon which the schedule rates have been paid. To secure uniformity, it will be necessary for every shipper not only to see to it that he and all other shippers are charged the posted schedule rates but also to take note whether suits are brought for the recovery of damages, for unless he does so, and promptly sues himself in case others do, he may find that a jury has greatly reduced the rate by way of damage in favor of some competitor, and thus he is placed at a disadvantage. Moreover, it would render it not only impossible, but a matter of comparative ease, for the carrier and favored shippers to provide for rebates upon schedule rates. The shippers can pay the schedule rates. At the proper time suit can be brought to recover damages for an unreasonable charge. A jury can be readily convinced, in the absence of a vigorous defense, that the claim for damages is just, and a verdict follows, and thus the rebate is secured.

It is apparent that if the schedule of rates provided for by the act and adopted and posted in accordance with its provisions is not to be accepted as the basis for determining whether charges made are reasonable, then the carriers and shippers alike are left without any certain or reliable guide for determining the rate that should be demanded and paid for given shipments.

This manner of regulating interstate commerce by means provided in this bill is the best. Congress can regulate the charges of these transportation companies by fixing a legislative standard of charges. This is done when Congress declares that the rate shall be reasonable and just and fairly remunerative. This is the exercise of the legislative function, and it is perfectly competent for the Congress to authorize an administrative board to carry out the legislative will. There can be no dispute of these propositions. A review of the Granger case, of the Reagan case, of the Stone case, or the Mississippi Commission cases, or the Nebraska case, will satisfy one of the correctness of this position. And more than that, Mr. Chairman, this means of administering a law in its details not only has the approval of the highest judicial authority in the land in the cases that I have mentioned, and a number of others, but it has the sanction of that tribunal as expressed in the Nebraska rate case in the 169th U. S. Report, on page 527.

What are the considerations to which weight must be given when we seek to ascertain the compensation that a railroad company is entitled to receive and the prohibition upon the receiving of which may be fairly deemed a deprivation by legislative decree of property without due process of law? Undoubtedly the question could be more easily determined by a commission composed of persons whose special skilled observation and experience qualify them to so handle great problems of transportation as to do justice both to the public and those whose money has been used to construct and maintain highways for the convenience and benefit of the people.

Sometimes, Mr. Chairman, I may remark parenthetically, when Members on this floor speak of the rights of the people they are called demagogues. It is a popular fashion nowadays for writers in the magazines and the public prints to assail the Members of Congress who dare stand up and assert the rights of the people and invoke their great name in behalf of the cause they advocate. Here we have the highest tribunal of the country employing the very expression for the use of which you, Mr. Chairman, and I may be denominated as demagogues. This decision which I have quoted refers to the public "and those whose money has been used to construct and maintain highways for the convenience and benefit of the people." So that no man who advocates or supports this measure, if we pay deference to the Supreme Court decision, can be accused of being a demagogue or be accused of favoring revolutionary or unlawful methods, for that great tribunal has by expressed words sanctioned what we are now about to do. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to dwell upon all the features of the pending bill, for I believe that every feature embraced in this bill is a good feature and should be enacted into law. I believe that every provision of this bill, every word and line of it, makes for the good of the great common people of our common country. [Applause.] They, and not the multimillionaires made such by their unlawful regulations and extortionate and sometimes criminal practices, are deserving of our best consideration. But time will not permit me to refer to all the features of the bill. I would support it did it embrace only putting the single provision of private cars, the icing of cars, terminal and switch facilities under the jurisdiction of the railroad commission. [Applause.] Go and ask any commission merchant, go and ask any shipper, go and ask any producer who has had dealings with these great transportation companies whether or not he has been treated with the same consideration in the shipment of his goods or his produce which has been accorded to the Armours, the Swifts, and the great packing concerns of this country. You will ascertain that they have been given preferences in divers ways so that the small man engaged in competition with them has in many cases been driven from that competition. It is by this species of favoritism that the beef trust has been built up and fostered and is maintained to-day. [Applause.] I believe that this provision of this law will go further than anything else to break down the beef trust and criminal trade conspiracies of the like kind. [Applause.] And the act of 1903, the Elkins law, is strengthened.

The twentieth section of this bill amends that law, and will go far toward preventing secret practices, preferences, rebates, and the like, which have been so difficult to deal with, and which have really resulted in building up immense fortunes in the hands of those favored by such practices, preferences, rebates, and the like. The Standard Oil, United States Steel Corporation, Carnegie, the Armours, and the others have obtained their start and grown rich by reason of these rebates and the like favors. The Elkins law has not been, except in few cases, enforceable, because the receiver and the giver are equally liable to the penalties under the law, and it is therefore only by indirect methods that the violation of the law can be established. The whole system of executing the Elkins law under present conditions without the amendment proposed in this bill is that of espionage and by prying into the affairs of the receiver of rebates and the offending corporation. But under this bill the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to go into the office of the railroad company and investigate every act performed by them, and will not have to resort to spying systems as the means of obtaining evidence.

Under this bill ample provision is made whereby through bookkeeping, whereby through the system of obtaining information under penalties and by the publicity required, it will be impossible for rebates and preferences to be given without detection. The shipper and the receiver are both, under the Elkins Act, made particeps criminis, and there is no way under existing law to find out the guilty ones; but under this bill the evidence can easily be had.

The question of the "midnight tariff" is prohibited in this bill, and that entitles it to the support of every man here. But the great and crowning feature of this bill is the power conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission not only, as under existing law, to ascertain that a rate is unjust and unreasonable, but this law provides that the Commission may prescribe for the future government of that transportation company what shall be a just and reasonable rate. [Applause.] That is the best feature of this bill, good as are all the rest. And I believe that it will go far toward solving the great evil of overcharges complained of by the suffering American public.

Mr. Chairman, let us act for the good of the people as our forefathers did when they founded our government. Let us do, by constitutional methods, what is demanded by the public, and do it now, so that our country may march on in development, in usefulness, and in beneficence to mankind, and so that the Republic may continue to be under heaven the best government in all the ages, in all the world. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the importance of this subject is indicated by the magnitude of the interests involved

It demands most serious consideration at the hands of every Representative casting his vote. There are in this country more than 214,000 miles of railway. These railways and their equipments are valued at something more than $12,000,000,000. Their gross earnings for the year ending June 30, 1905, amount to more than $2,000,000,000. Their net earnings for last year, according to authentic figures, were more than $800,000,000. There are on the pay rolls of the railroads of the United States more than 1,250,000 employees. Their salaries amount to more than $817,000,000. These figures suggest the vast importance of the pending measure. We should proceed with intelligence and conservatism in this legislation. No unworthy sentiment, breathing sensationalism or rashness, should influence the vote of any Representative. Our action should be temperate and deliberate to the utmost degree. It is not believed that any Representative wishes to do harm to the great railway properties of the United States. Their rights should be strictly regarded and scrupulously protected just as those of individuals. Let us hope that every Representative of the people is desirous of according evenhanded justice to those great and valuable institutions that have done so much for the upbuilding and advancement of the material interests of the country.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] has stigmatized this bill as breathing "anarchy, communism, and socialism." He has said that Mr. Bryan is the pioneer and author of the doctrine demanding the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. These are grave charges. He states that practically the whole Republican party is now following the banner held aloft by Mr. Bryan while he proclaims the just regulation of the great railway corporations of the United States. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] pertinently asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania why the Republican party so loyally and solidly followed the banner of William J. Bryan if this measure were prompted by "anarchy, communism, and socialism." The question stunned and staggered the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he failed to give an intelligent answer. So marked was the effect of this interrogatory upon him that one of my colleagues, sitting near me, quietly remarked that this colloquy reminded him of the old story of a negro preacher who was delivering a sermon on "the beginning of the world and the creation of man." He said to his congregation that "when God made man he took a little piece of mud and rolled it into a round ball and then fashioned it into shape, making it in the image of man, and set it up against a fence to dry in the sunshine." At this point one of his congregation arose from his pew and remarked: "Parson Jackson, will you please tell me whose fence dat was?" The parson promptly replied: "Set down dar and shet your mouth, nigger. Such fool questions as dat will spile any man's theology." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that if this is socialism and anarchy it is not new in this country. Let me further say that if this demand of the people is not heeded at the other end of the Capitol and a wise and conservative regulatory statute enacted into law, the time will speedily come when the American people will arise in their might and follow to victory this banner held aloft by William J. Bryan. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This is no modern doctrine. The gentleman is mistaken when he terms it centralization. The doctrine of regulating interstate commerce is as old as the Constitution. It came into being with that instrument. When that document was penned the power was expressly conferred on Congress to regulate all commerce between the States, with foreign nations, and Indian tribes. There is no centralization in this provision of the Constitution. Prior to its adoption the regulations and restrictions of the various States on commerce with one another was so harassing and oppressive that it became necessary to lodge this power where it could be exerted with uniformity. Out of these different regulations of commerce more than anything else arose the necessity for the Constitution. Hence the States, when the Constitution was adopted, were shorn of their power to regulate interstate commerce, and the whole subject was placed under the Federal Government. The States were not robbed of many of their original and inherent rights, as exemplified in their police powers and various other rights retained by them by express reservation. But this power over interstate commerce was completely surrendered.

The founders of the Constitution wisely provided that interstate commerce and all instrumentalities thereof should come under the control of the Federal Government, and that it should be endowed with plenary power to deal with that subject in whatever form it might arise. Commerce is a term of well-defined meaning. It was ably discussed and elucidated in the memorable opinion delivered by Chief Justice Marshall in the very first case dealing with the commerce clause of the Constitution, Gibbons v. Ogden. In that decision the great Chief Justice sharply drew the lines between the powers of the States to deal with commerce and the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, on the other hand, to regulate all interstate commerce. His opinion and reasoning have been adhered to for more than a century and stand out to-day as the settled law of the land. It has been affirmed and reaffirmed hundreds of times by all the appellate courts of the States of this Union and by the Supreme Court of the United States. Take this bill and measure it and square it by that great opinion and there is nothing of anarchy, socialism, communism, or centralization in it. We are but exercising the broad and plenary powers which our forefathers wrote into the Constitution. It will not be amiss to here quote the exact language of the Constitution:

> The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

In this case, as in that, we are dealing with the subject of commerce, which includes the great transportation lines between the States of this Union. Chief Justice Marshall held commerce to mean not only traffic and intercourse between the States, but navigation as well. He says:

> Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic; but it is something more, it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse. The mind can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of the one nation into the ports of the other, and be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals in the actual employment of buying and selling, or of barter.

So the subject with which we are dealing to-day is commerce and its instrumentalities, as found and carried on between the various States of this Union, and which correctly come within the provisions of this section of the Constitution. Congress is endowed with the very fullest authority to legislate on this subject. Again, Chief Justice Marshall says:

> This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms, and do not affect the questions which arise in this case or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has been always understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

We may stand by this clear provision of the Constitution, and the masterly opinion of this great Chief Justice, without the shadow of a doubt that we are unequivocally clothed with the power to deal with the subject before us. Are the great interstate railways and their traffic in passengers and freight commerce?

In view of the above an affirmative answer only can be given. It is true that in our early history, when the Constitution was written, there were no railways, and they were not in contemplation in that instrument. The great public highways were the rivers, inlets, bays, the Gulf, and the oceans. Still, our fathers builded wiser than they knew and inserted clauses which, by their language and intendment, necessarily included all instrumentalities of interstate commerce which should come within their legitimate scope in after years. Mr. Chairman, the demand has come from all over this country for the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This is no new thing; it is no sudden outburst on the part of the people. In 1896, when it was indicated by the Supreme Court that the Interstate Commerce Commission was not given the power to establish a reasonable rate in the place of an unreasonable one, the Democratic convention, thereafter assembled, pronounced emphatically in favor of giving that tribunal such power, if it did not then have such jurisdiction. Since that day the question has been agitated before the American people, and the Democratic party thrice, in its platforms of 1896, 1900, and 1904, has unequivocally declared to the country in favor of the same. The Interstate Commerce Commission time after time, in its annual reports, has suggested the deficiency of its power since the ruling of the Supreme Court. In their last report, that of 1905, reiterating their former suggestion, they say:

> Of these, the most important is the delegation of authority to the Commission to determine what rates should be substituted for the future in place of one found, after full hearing, to be unlawful, with the further provision that an order of the Commission prescribing such substituted rate should take effect within a reasonable time unless vacated and set aside by judicial proceedings.

This is the great point contended for by the people. This bill does not contain all that it should express, according to my judgment. It should go much further and include private car lines and express companies by the most explicit language. The long and short haul clause should be amended, so as to revivify that provision, as contained in section 4. The word "maximum" should be eliminated entirely from this bill. Yet this proposed act has many good features, and travels a number of steps in the right direction. So salutary are its provisions that it shall receive my cordial support, notwithstanding the fact that I strenuously contend that it does not go far enough. In 1897 the Interstate Commerce Commission was shorn of its power to substitute a rate for one found to be unreasonable. The Supreme Court decided that the Commission did not have this power in what is known as the "Maximum Rate Case," found in 167 United States Reports. This language is used:

> We have, therefore, these considerations presented: First, the power to prescribe a tariff of rates for carriage by a common carrier is a legislative and not an administrative or judicial function, and, having respect to the large amount of property invested in railroads, the various companies engaged therein, the thousands of miles of road, and the millions of tons of freight carried, the varying and diverse conditions attaching to a carriage, is a power of supreme delicacy and importance. Second, that Congress has transferred such a power to any administrative body is not to be presumed or implied from any doubtful and uncertain language. The words and phrases efficacious to make such a delegation of power are well understood and have been frequently used, and if Congres had intended to grant such a power to the Interstate Commerce Commission it can not be doubted that it would have used language open to no misconstruction, but clear and direct. Third, incorporating into a statute the common-law obligation resting upon the carrier to make all its charges reasonable and just, and directing the Commission to execute and enforce the provisions of the act, does not by implication carry to the Commission or invest it with the power to exercise the legislative function of prescribing rates which shall control in the future. Fourth, beyond the inference which irresistibly follows from the omission to grant in express terms to the Commission this power of fixing rates, is the clear language of section 6, recognizing the right of the carrier to establish rates, to increase or reduce them, and prescribing the conditions upon which such increase or reduction may be made, and requiring, as the only condition of its action, first, publication, and, second, the filing of the tariff with the Commission. The grant to the Commission of the power to prescribe the form of the schedule and to direct the place and manner of publication of joint rates, thus specifying the scope and limits of its functions in this respect, strengthens the conclusion that the power to prescribe the rates or fix any tariff for the future is not among the powers granted to the Commission. These considerations convince us that under the interstate-commerce act the Commission has no power to prescribe the tariff of rates which shall control in the future, and, therefore, can not invoke a judgment in mandamus from the courts to enforce any such tariff by it prescribed. * * * Our conclusion, then, is that Congress has not conferred upon the Commission the legislative power of prescribing rates, either maximum or minimum, or absolute. As it did not give the express power to the Commission, it did not intend to secure the same result indirectly by empowering that tribunal to determine what in reference to the past was reasonable and just, whether as maximum, minimum, or absolute, and then enable it to obtain from the courts a peremptory order that in the future the railroad companies should follow the rates thus determined in the past to have been reasonable and just.

This opinion emasculated the law and left the Interstate Commerce Commission almost a helpless and irresponsible body for the purposes for which it was created. In 1896 the Supreme Court had already said, in 162 United States Reports:

> Whether Congress intended to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to itself fix rates was mooted in the courts below and is discussed in the briefs of counsel. * * * We do not find any provision of the act that expressly, or by necessary implication, confers such a power.

Since the day of the decision in the Maximum Rate Case the people have demanded that the damage done in these opinions be remedied by this body. Hence this is no sudden movement, but comes from a steadfast demand, constant agitation, and righteous appeal on the part of the people extending over a decade.

Permit me to allude briefly to the President's attitude. Believing in his personal honesty and sincerity, I can not but regret that he did not remain firm in his first pronouncement. In his annual message of 1904 he used bold and vigorous language. Those were burning words and would have redounded to his everlasting honor and to the eternal good of the people had he adhered to them and insisted to the end that they be enacted into law. He said:

> The Government must in increasing degree supervise and regulate the workings of the railways engaged in interstate commerce, and such increased supervision is the only alternative to an increase of the present evils on the one hand or a still more radical policy on the other. The most important legislative act now needed as regards the regulation of corporations is this act to confer on the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to revise rates and regulations, the revised rate to go at once into effect and stay in effect unless and until the court of review reverses it.

These were weighty words and met the most righteous demand of the American people. What a pity indeed that he did not continue to stand with the people. Some occult hypnotic or strange power wrought a change in his mind and he shifted his position. What power was it? He there declared that the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the power to revise rates and make regulations in interstate commerce. He insisted that the revised rate should go into effect at once and stay in effect until the court of review reverses it. This was the impregnable position which would have brought salutary effects to the people. It did seem as if his words were well chosen and intended for execution. To this day there appears no good reason for changing the words, but somehow his mind has shifted. In less than twelve months we hear him announcing a different sentiment. When he introduced the views thus expressed the railway presidents and many of their officials and those opposed to railway regulation all over the United States arose opposing him and demanded that his ideas be defeated. The people followed him, cheered him on, and urged that his ideas be crystallized into law. In the spring he made a tour through the South, delivering a series of speeches on the great public questions before the American people. When he reached the historic State of North Carolina, at its capital, in his Raleigh speech, he announced a new doctrine, changed his original language, and declared in favor of what is known as "the maximum reasonable rate" theory. This was a great fall from his former position on the subject. Immediately the railway presidents and other officials and those opposed to railway regulation turned somersaults and ran headlong over one another to get in the procession and follow the President in his crusade for "maximum reasonable rates" under his new theory. They did not resist him then. They gladly accepted and embraced this new doctrine.

Let it be borne in mind that the Commission had simply suggested that the plain power of substituting a reasonable rate for one found to be unreasonable was all that was necessary. The President for a while followed them, but he now recast his language and set up a different standard of regulation, which drew around him those who had been heretofore opposed to him. There is much significance in this part of our history; and in the days to come the battle before the people and in the courts will be fought around these propositions. The word "maximum" will be the source of many a bitter legal struggle. It will be historic ground. When we assembled at this session of Congress the President sent in another annual message, receding from his former position and giving official utterance to his new "maximum rate" theory and ideas. In his message of December 5 he says:

> In my judgment, the most important provision which such law should contain is that conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and, if found to be unreasonable and unjust, then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the maximum reasonable rate, as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts.

If the President had adhered to his original position, to-day, instead of passing this measure, we would have been enacting into law a more wholesome one, empowering the Interstate Commerce Commission to substitute a reasonable rate for one found to be unreasonable. His party in Congress would have followed him, and he alone is responsible for this fatal change. Such language and such a rate have received judicial construction by the American courts a thousand times and are thoroughly understood by the American people. The term "reasonable rate" has a thoroughly understood and accepted legal meaning. The new language must undergo a period of judicial history and a series of interpretations by the courts, and it will take years to define, construe, and develop the newfangled ideas embraced in this bill. For more than fifty years the courts have held that roads could only charge "reasonable" rates. Why now turn aside from our plain beaten path of judicial history and befog our way with additional qualifications?

Let us now proceed to the question of the power of Congress to establish rates through a commission. Our action here is being scrutinized by the country at large. The authority to endow the Interstate Commerce Commission with the jurisdiction to establish rates is challenged by many eminent lawyers in the United States. Each day brings through the mails pamphlets and books written against our jurisdiction on this proposition. It is challenged by many railroads; their presidents, officers, and agents are filling the press and magazines with arguments against it. A former Attorney-General and Secretary of State has gone into the magazines, challenging the constitutional authority of Congress. There are men of wisdom and eminence in this country who contend that we have no power to authorize the Commission to fix a rate, claiming that it is delegating the legislative authority of Congress. With all these contentions on every hand, it seems to me the part of wisdom that it should be established here in our proceedings that such power is clearly and unequivocally conferred upon this body. The Supreme Court of the United States has settled that question where it was clearly before that tribunal. It is not a mere obiter dictum, as claimed by many, but the concrete proposition was carried up to the Supreme Court of the United States. The question was propounded, and if the power did not exist and could not have been conferred, the Supreme Court would have undoubtedly so answered on either branch of the proposition. But to put at rest all controversy, permit me to read the exact language contained in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States:

There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates, or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty, or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates subject to regulation and restriction, as well as to that rule which is as old as common carriers, to wit, that the rates must be reasonable. * * * Administrative control over railroads through boards or commissions was no new thing. It had been resorted to in England and in many States of this Union.

Here, on a question directly certified, the Supreme Court, in vigorous language, holds that Congress can confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to prescribe the rates to be charged on interstate railroads. As said in the opinion of the Supreme Court, it was no new power. It had been exercised for hundreds of years at common law in England. It has been done in this country by the legislatures of various States. The first State commission case came up from Mississippi, and is known as one of the Railway Commission cases. In 1884 the State of Mississippi had passed an act providing for the regulation of freight and passenger rates in that State and to create a commission for that purpose. The commission was authorized to establish tariffs covering the whole body of rates on the railroads within the boundaries of Mississippi. The railroads went into the courts and challenged the law on several grounds, among them "that the law conferred both legislative and judicial powers on the commission and was thus repugnant to the constitution of Mississippi." Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court, and in an unanswerable opinion sustained the constitutionality of the Mississippi law. In his opinion he says:

The great purpose of the statute now under consideration is to fix a maximum of charges and to regulate in some matters of a police nature the use of railroads in the State. In its general scope it is constitutional, and it applies equally to all persons or corporations owning or operating railroads in the State. * * * The supreme court of Mississippi has decided that the statute is not repugnant to the constitution of the State "in that it creates a commission and charges it with the duty of supervising the railroads." To this we agree, and this is all that need be decided in this case.

This was the pioneer case in State railway commission cases. Another most important decision was rendered in the Texas Commission Case. The opinion is found in 154 United States Reports. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court, and it was one of the strongest ever written on this subject. His language is bold and convincing. He says:

Passing from the question of jurisdiction to the act itself, there can be no doubt of the power of a State to regulate the fares and freights which may be charged and received by railroads or other carriers, and that this regulation may be carried on by means of a commission. Such a commission is merely an administrative board created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislation.

Again:

As we have seen it, it is not the function of the courts to establish a schedule of rates. It is not, therefore, within our power to prepare a new schedule or rearrange this. Our inquiry is limited to the effect of the tariff as a whole, including therein the rates prescribed for all the several classes of goods, and the decree must either condemn or sustain this act of quasi legislation. If a law be adjudged invalid, the court may not in the decree attempt to enact a law upon the same subject which shall be obnoxious to no legal objections. It stops with simply passing its judgment on the validity of the act before it. The same rule obtains in a case like this.

In these two cases the Supreme Court sustained the power of the State legislature to establish a railroad commission, and holds that it is not delegating legislative authority to such a body. It was held that the power of fixing rates is peculiarly a legislative act and one that can best be done through a commission. No reference was made to the constitutional provisions of either State authorizing such action by the legislatures thereof. The Supreme Court placed the constitutionality upon the broad ground that it is within the legislative scope of a State to take such action, having no reference to the organic acts of such State. Logic can not distinguish the difference between the authority of the State to create a commission to fix rates and that of Congress. If the State can do it, by the same parity of reasoning Congress can do it. The power is to perform a mere administrative act and is not a delegation of legislative authority. The courts have, in an unvarying and overwhelming line of cases, so held. The current of decision has set in that direction from the beginning of our history, and Congress has exercised an analogous power more than a hundred times. Indeed, we did nothing more nor less when we created the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887 and set it as a guardian over commerce between the States. Here in three cases we have the power unequivocally acknowledged by the Supreme Court of the United States.

This great legislative body can well afford to stand upon such high judicial ground already marked out and occupied by eminent judges of the country. There is still a later opinion from the Supreme Court upholding the State railway commission on practically the same grounds. In the case of Smyth v. Ames the commission act of the State of Nebraska was sustained in a strong opinion by Justice Harlan, one of the truly great judges of our Republic. That eminent judge says:

A corporation maintaining a public highway, although it owns the property it employs for accomplishing public objects, must be held to have accepted its rights, privileges, and franchises subject to the condition that the government creating it, or the government within whose limits it conducts its business, may by legislation protect the people against unreasonable charges for the services rendered by it. It can not be assumed that a railroad corporation, accepting franchises, rights, and privileges at the hands of the public, ever supposed that it acquired, or that it was intended to grant to it, the power to construct and maintain a public highway simply for its benefit without regard to the rights of the public.

In this case the court reaffirmed the decision in the Mississippi case and in the Reagan case from Texas and held the Nebraska commission law constitutional. Unless the court reverses itself and diverts this strong current of decisions, there is not the semblance of a doubt that Congress has warrant under the Constitution to authorize a Commission to substitute a reasonable for an unreasonable rate.

It is now an accepted fact that six great corporations control more than 180,000 miles of railway of this Republic. It is also true, as said by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that competition between railroads has almost disappeared. Judge Prouty, one of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, well said before the Senate committee investigating this question:

When I came on the Interstate Commerce Commission eight years ago there was the most vigorous competition in rates between the railroads in all parts of the country. To-day that competition has disappeared.

And again he has truly said:

I say that competition between the railroads has ceased, or, if it has not ceased, it will in the near future. The end is not yet.

Mr. Chairman, I would not do violence to property rights in this country by my vote or my voice. It is realized that these railway interests own and control property worth more than $12,000,000,000. At the same time they assess their property at less than $3,000,000,000. These great interests are given the right by law to tax the people on shipments of interstate traffic. Interstate traffic amounts to almost 80 per cent of the freight shipped in America. These gigantic institutions are authorized to directly tax 80,000,000 people on these shipments. There is now no one standing between them and the shippers to control their avaricious greed. The people are being burdened by them without representation. Here in this bill we propose to pass a temperate law to control them, and to say that the people who are being thus assessed and oppressed are entitled to representation and hearing in some way. These great companies are not private institutions. They are not private property in the commercial sense of the word. These corporations are creatures of the law, having the breath of life breathed into them by the representatives of the people. They have no right to rise above the power that made them. We, as representatives of our constituents, should stand between them and these artificial beings, and see that justice is done to both. [Applause.] Better expression of the nature of their public franchises can not be found than to quote the strong language used by Justice Harlan in the Nebraska case:

A railroad is a public highway, and none the less so because constructed and maintained through the agency of a corporation deriving its existence and powers from the State. Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the State. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public. It is under governmental control, though such control must be exercised with due regard to the constitutional guaranties for the protection of its property. It can not be, therefore, admitted that a railroad corporation maintaining a public highway under the authority of the State may fix a rate with a view solely to its own interests and ignore the rights of the public. But the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad are exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public or the fair value of the services rendered, but in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to its stockholders.

We are willing to square our conduct here to-day in enacting this law by this temperate and just language of the Supreme Court. If we are anarchists, communists, and socialists, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, so are the judges of the Supreme Court. [Applause.] Well may we be thankful that we live in a Government where the representatives of the people can read the plain language of the Constitution and see that it confers upon their servants the power of authorizing a commission to stand between them and these creatures of the law that have grown so powerful that they defy the very mandates of the constituted authorities. And we can congratulate ourselves that those representatives are brave enough to do their duty in the face of criticism and slander. [Applause.] Neither in my individual nor representative capacity would I lay violent hands upon the railroads. Their benefits are too great, their services have been too useful. We realize what they have done for this country, and also we know what we have done for them. They have aided in building up the waste places all over the Republic. In my own State, the great State of Texas, they have been joint pioneers with the hardy citizens who went to that empire when it was but a wilderness. Still, we have helped them there and given them millions of acres of land and hundreds of thousands of dollars as donations. We have never mistreated them in our State, but our people have undertaken to control them in Texas, and have succeeded as far as their domestic operations are concerned, and we have not injured them. We established a railroad commission and placed at its head the author and founder of the Interstate Commerce Commission idea, the old Roman, John H. Reagan, who has gone to his reward and left a name that is a household word not only in the State of Texas, but throughout the length and breadth of the land wherever patriotism is revered and purity of purpose appreciated. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there were dire predictions made in my State when we established the commission, and it was said that we had retarded the building of railroads, that we were standing in the way of progress. But since our commission was established we have not laid violent hands upon the railroads of Texas. The records show that since our commission was created Texas has constructed more miles of railway than any other State in the Union, and they have prospered more than ever in all their previous history there, thus exhibiting the beneficent effect of such legislation. [Applause.] We did not confer upon the commission merely the simple power of establishing a reasonable rate where one was found to be unreasonable. We gave the commission the broad power to establish tariffs upon the whole body of railway rates in Texas. The railroads contested the law and said that Texas was confiscating their property. They took their cases to the Supreme Court of the United States. They litigated every point and contested every inch of the ground.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. The difference between the act creating the Texas railroad commission and this act, if I understand it, is that the commission in Texas had the right to fix and prescribe a schedule of rates for the government of railroads doing business in that State, and the present bill, so far is it confers additional power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, gives them the power to revise and correct an unjust rate fixed by the railroads for interstate transportation.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman's contention is correct.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman further: And if the Texas law was constitutional and right to the full extent, isn't this law, which gives simply revisory and corrective power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, equally as right and constitutional?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There can be no argument about it, and the Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding in favor of the Texas law, never once referred to the constitution of Texas, but announced its decision on the broad proposition that the State had the right to create a commission to perform an act purely administrative. And still the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], for whom I have a great regard and admiration, talks about this being anarchy and communism, and says that it tends to socialism. Mr. Chairman, from the Granger cases, which were decided in 94 United States Reports, on down to the last commission case, it has been favorably decided, and in every instance all the appellate courts in the various States of the Union and the Supreme Court have marched right ahead, dismissing the proposition that such laws are confiscatory, anarchistic, socialistic, and have unhesitatingly decided that such power resided in the State legislatures and the Congress of the United States and were as old as the governments exercising it. If it has come to pass in this country that these great combinations, owning more than $12,000,000,000 of the property of the nation, are above the Constitution and the Supreme Court of the land, it is high time that we were reforming our Government and adopting an amendment to the Constitution in order to protect ourselves from these gigantic corporate agencies. [Applause.]

There are many phases of this question to which I would like to refer, but time forbids. It would please me if there were sufficient time to go into an extended legal argument as to the power of Congress in the premises, for by a line of precedents, legal decisions, and eminent authorities that are overwhelming and incontestible I could establish the power for which we are contending to-day. We may well content ourselves with the reflection that this power was given by Congress in 1887 and was exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission for ten years, and that we are simply but reconferring that authority. The demand comes from all over this country for such legislation. Unreasonable and exorbitant charges by the railroads exist everywhere. They have discriminated against individuals and against localities, and have given undue preferences in hundreds of instances, until the people, outraged by these unlawful acts, have demanded relief at the hands of their representatives. We are the only body that can correct the evil. It would give me pleasure if I could discuss many unreasonable rates that are referred to in the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission and are seen in many of the legal reports of this country. The Interstate Commerce Commission has condemned the orange rates from California, the fruit rates from Michigan, from Georgia, Texas, and other States, the lumber rates from the South, the rates on coal, the grain rates from many States, the cattle rates from Texas. Turn where you may, an unreasonable rate, already denounced by the Commission, rises up to confront you. These things cry out, demanding relief, from nearly every State in the Union. The shippers are growing sick and tired of litigating in a barren forum. They want, and have a right to expect, relief at our hands. Read the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they put their fingers on hundreds and hundreds of unreasonable rates in nearly every section of this broad land. They say also, and emphatically reiterate, that the great body of rates have been vastly increased on all the railroads in the last three or four years. And this is certainly undeniable. In 1903 the rates on all the roads leading into Texas were exorbitantly raised. Judge Prouty, in his testimony before the Senate committee, states:

> * * * About the 1st of January, 1903, the rates from St. Louis and that territory into Texas were advanced. They were advanced to a higher point than they had ever touched before since the Interstate Commerce Commission existed, and we felt that it was our duty to investigate the question of those rates. This situation was developed: Articles consumed in Texas are purchased both in St. Louis and Chicago and also in New York. Now, the rate from New York to Galveston and from Galveston to the interior town of Texas, common points, as compared with the rate from St. Louis to Texas common points, determines whether the goods shall be bought in New York or in St. Louis, so that you have there market competition. It turned out that before this advance in rates from St. Louis into Texas, an agreement had been made between the steamship lines which serve Texas and the railroads which carry that traffic into the interior, by which the rates from New York were to be advanced to the same extent that the rates from St. Louis were to be advanced, and the traffic men testified that they could not and they would not have made the advance from St. Louis had not the New York line agreed to make the advance from New York.

The cattlemen of Texas have been subjected to onerous burdens. The rates on their shipments have been raised to an unprecedented and unreasonable degree. Talk about confiscating the property of the railroads! The railroads have almost confiscated the property of the Texas cattle raisers, and many other shippers of products into and out of Texas. [Applause.] By revitalizing the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as originally designed, we give the people a tribunal in which they can make their complaints and rectify these outrages and wrongs. It would be far better to strike out the word "maximum" and leave the word "reasonable" in the law—a word that has been construed in the courts. The expression "reasonable rate" has a well-defined meaning and has been adjudicated in innumerable decisions. It also has an accepted common-law meaning. But when we insert the word "maximum" in the language, we open the flood gates of controversy, and it will take a quarter of a century to settle the legal propositions involved. Mr. Chairman, it makes no difference to me whether this be termed a Democratic or a Republican measure. No matter what brand you put upon it, no useful purpose will be subserved by raising the question of party politics here to-day. It is the duty of the representatives of the people, no matter to which party they belong, when a great question like this comes before the American Congress to march in the right direction and make a fight in behalf of righteousness. [Applause.]

Many predict that what we are doing is unconstitutional and when the act goes to the Supreme Court it will declare against it. Reading the decisions of a hundred years as I have, studying the Constitution of my country with my best endeavor, I have come to the conclusion that when we restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power of which it was robbed, and the question comes before the Supreme Court there will not be a dissenting vote, but every voice will ring out in favor of the validity of this act. [Applause.] This act will hardly meet the expectations of the American people. It does not go as far as it should go, but, in my judgment, it goes many steps in the right direction. It is not necessary that this body take any action that is radical; but let us keep before our eyes the rule of conservatism toward the great interests involved. If we but do our duty on this occasion, the American people in the years to come will rise up and bless the name of every Representative for reenacting this law, which is tempered with justice to all the people and injustice to no interests. If I had it in my power, I would so amend the present bill as to restore the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission given under the long and short haul clause of the interstate-commerce act.

That section reads in part as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included in the longer distance, but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the Commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the Commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the Commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

The Alabama Midland decision in the 168 United States Reports nullified this section of the law. It was held in that cause that where there was water competition, market competition, or railroad competition, the circumstances were substantially dissimilar and the railroads could charge more for a shorter haul than for a longer haul, and the long and short haul clause did not apply. In this act we should destroy the effect of that opinion and put it beyond the power of the courts to say that competition by water, in the markets, or by rail render the circumstances and conditions dissimilar. Reinvest the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power to say when circumstances and conditions could be waived, letting them say when the railroads could charge more for a shorter haul than for a longer haul. In my judgment, when you put it in the power of the Commission to establish a maximum rate and then leave it in the power of the railroads to fix a rate regardless of the long and short haul clause and regardless of the minimum rate, you give them the power to discriminate against individuals and against localities, and induce them to violate the Elkins law against giving and receiving rebates. In their reports of 1903 and 1904 the Interstate Commerce Commission commended the Elkins law and said that it had gone far toward the prevention of rebates. In 1905, in their report, they apologize for what they said in 1903 and 1904, and say that the effect of the Elkins Act has not been as wholesome as they had thought. They say:

In our annual report for 1903 we endeavored to explain the changes in the regulating statute effected by the Elkins law, so called, which was approved in the previous February, and made some favorable comments upon its operation. A similar opinion was expressed in the report made a year ago. Further experience, however, compels us to modify in some degree the hopeful expectations then entertained. Not only have various devices for evading the law been brought into use, but the actual payment of rebates as such has been here and there resumed. Instances of this kind have been established by convincing proof, on which prosecutions have been commenced and are now pending. More frequently the unjust preference is brought about by methods which may escape the penalties of the law, but which plainly operate to defeat its purpose.

We should amend this bill, restoring the penalties of the interstate-commerce act which inflicted the punishment of imprisonment for its violation. We should so amend it as to make it possible to punish the great railway officials, corporation officers, and agents who willfully and flagrantly violate the law and put them in the penitentiary, as well as the small clerk who happens to make a false entry in the books, perhaps at the dictation of his chief. Wide-open prison doors alone will deter them. Let us throw them open for their reception. If we are very much in earnest, if we mean to give the people relief, why tremble, why hesitate on this question? We have the authority to act. Let us meet the situation. Every man on the other side of this House says that rebates are criminal. If so, let us make them criminal, and authorize the fine and imprisonment of any official or individual who grants or receives them. If we believe what we say, why not enact a law that meets the demands of the people? Why not make our action certain and effective? Why do we hesitate to go as far as conservatism and justice demand? Are we afraid of their influence? If they have grown so powerful that the representatives who breathe the breath of life into them can not control them, it is high time that our system of government be reformed. Shall we tremble and fear to do our duty in enacting a law that calls for imprisonment as well as a heavy fine? With patriotic voice let us say that we are ready to do our duty. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves the discussion of the Elkins law I desire to ask him if, in his opinion, the present bill would in any respect repeal the penalties provided for in the Elkins law?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have not examined it particularly with reference to that, but feel confident that it does not.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is my understanding that it does not repeal the penalties.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think it leaves the Elkins law as it was. That is my impression now.

Mr. CLAYTON. Merely provides additional machinery for the enforcement of the provisions of the Elkins law, as I understand it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; but I would amend it and restore the imprisonment feature of the law of 1887 and make it effective.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is not that feature of the Elkins law preserved?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The Elkins law eliminated the imprisonment feature of the interstate-commerce law of 1887, and we should restore that.

Mr. CLAYTON. To the original interstate-commerce law?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I understand the gentleman's comments.

Mr. JAMES. And it is impossible to imprison a man under that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; it is not possible to imprison a man under the law. The act is good as far as it goes, but it does not go as far as it should.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would take pleasure in supporting the amendment suggested by the gentleman to the present bill.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Such an amendment should be offered and doubtless will be submitted; and until we adopt such an amendment this part of the law will remain indeed puny and ineffective. Now, I say it does not go as far as it should. There is no necessity for cruel or unusual penalties, but I am in favor of one that will count for something, for so long as we assess a mere pecuniary fine against an officer of a corporation, a $5,000 fine, for a violation of law when the corporation is making $500,000, or some large amount, by virtue of that violation, he will not hesitate to break the law. [Applause.]

If we are in earnest and intend to destroy this practice of rebates and preferences, let us provide for imprisoning persons and officers who defy the law. Let us put stripes on the individuals and officers who are guilty, even if it reaches those high up in the world, with their millions and millions of dollars of wealth. The great and wealthy person is no less a criminal when he violates the law than the poor and penniless individual who has been guilty of such acts. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say against the man who has built up an honest fortune, against the man who has accumulated a competency for his family, who has erected a shelter over his wife and children to shield them from the storms and disasters of life, and the man who has laid aside a fair share of this world's goods. I would not arouse a spirit of anarchy, communism, or socialism; but so long as I am a Representative of the people I am ready to strike down hydra-headed monsters whenever they raise their hideous forms in this land to oppress the people and violate the laws of our Republic. [Applause.] Let us do no violence to any man who has great wealth, if he has honestly accumulated it. The man who stirs up the prejudices and passions of the people against the wealthy citizen because he is rich is a dangerous citizen. The Representative who would cry out against wealth because it is wealth is worse than a criminal, but the Representative who would favor just laws for all the people regardless of the station of the individual, whether he be high or low, whether he be wealthy or penniless, is a benefactor to his fellow-man and deserves highest praise at the hands of his constituents. The Representative who stands up before the country in favor of just laws, discriminating against none, setting his face firmly against class legislation, so righteous and equitable that all people hail them as a proclamation of equality before the law, establishes for himself a character before American citizenship as a Representative truly worthy of the greatest confidence. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the American people are a patient people and are slow to anger. They long endure oppression without revolt, and if relief from such oppression must come through national legislation they are indeed patient and long suffering, but when once aroused, when once made conscious of wrong unjustly endured, they straightway seek a remedy, and rash would be he who would put obstacles in their way.

Railroading in America may be said to have five ages. First came the age of construction. That was followed by the age of competition. Next came the age of combination, which in turn is about to be followed by the age which this legislation is to usher in—Government control—and there is the fifth and last age, that of Government ownership, from which may God save us. In regard to this evolution, let me call your attention to the status of affairs just prior to the enactment of the original interstate-commerce law. It was a chaotic stage in railroad construction and management. There was instability in methods and instability in rates and charges. Business was not safe, because it could not make definite plans. The moral atmosphere seemed obscured. Rebates were brazenly asked and as brazenly granted.

It was at this time that the American people became aroused. As a result an investigation was demanded at the hands of Congress, and the Cullom Commission of 1886 resulted. That Commission developed some remarkable conditions and showed to what lengths American railroads had gone or been forced to go in the preceding decade. It was this Commission of 1886 which developed the startling evidence in reference to the operations of the Standard Oil Company, to the effect that that company had demanded of the carriers a 10-cent per barrel rate on the oil it shipped, and at the same time had demanded that the carriers should ask of all independent shippers and producers 35 cents per barrel, and that of the 35 cents per barrel the Standard Oil Company was to be paid for its own use 25 cents. Never before had such a case of extortion, such a case of acquiescence on the part of the carrier, been presented to the American people; and this situation, with others, had much to do with promoting the legislation in the following year.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] yesterday or the day before stated that all anarchists, all paternalists, and all socialists favored this kind of legislation. I would like to ask him what act would more promote paternalism, socialism, and anarchy than these acts of the Standard Oil Company? [Applause.] It is a clear fact known of all men that anarchy and socialism and paternalism thrive in the great centers of population. They grow by what they feed upon. Why do these forms so alien to our institutions exist and grow in the great cities of our country? They grow there because in them the masses feel first and most keenly the iron heel of monopoly. In them the citizen sees the franchises which he grants to quasi-public corporations through the common council free of cost immediately capitalized, and then finds himself compelled to pay charges and fares to pay large dividends upon his own gift.

Under the interstate-commerce law of 1887, with the powers which that law gave to the Commission, great good was done and many of the evils which had existed theretofore were in large part abated. Business became more stableized, because rates became more fixed and certain. The railroads themselves, conscious that the Commission had the power, did not violate the law, but evinced a desire to obey it in spirit and letter. I know it is charged here, and it has been frequently charged by the learned counsel of railroad companies, that the Commission did not have the power to determine what rate should be substituted in lieu of one found to be unjust or unreasonable. And there has been a suggestion made on this floor that the Commission had even doubted its own authority to fix rates prior to the decision in the Maximum Rate case.

In replying to such contention and to resolve a doubt, if any exists, I wish to read the statement made by the Hon. William R. Morrison, one of the first Commissioners appointed, and one who was the Chairman of the Commission when, in 1897, the Maximum Rate case was decided. He used this language in the annual report of the Commission following this decision:

> The Commission exercised its power in a case commenced in the second month after its organization and continued to exercise it for a period of more than ten years, during which time no member of the Commission ever officially questioned the existence of such authority or failed to join in its exercise. As already stated, the authority of the Commission to modify and reduce an established rate and to enforce a reasonable rate for the future was not questioned in the answer—
> Mark you—
> in the answer of the defendant in the Atlantic Rate case, decided March 30, 1896, nor had it ever been denied in any answers made in more than four hundred previously commenced, many of them alleging unreasonable and unjust charges, and praying the Commission to afford a reduction and lower the rates in the future.

Sir, the surest test as to the purview of any law or the powers granted thereby will be found in the answers to any complaints brought under the law. Where would you expect to find doubts or suspicions as to the powers of the Commission if not in the answers filed by the defendants—the railroad companies? And yet, according to this unimpeachable authority, no such defense was ever made during the first ten years of the operation of the law. But in 1897, as has been so often said, the Commission lost its power to fix the rate for the future, but it did not on that account become a worthless body. It still had duties to perform, and still had the power of investigation; it still could hear complaints as to rates and determine as to their reasonableness, but had no power to make its orders effective.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. I understood the gentleman to say that the Commission lost its power in 1897 by this decision of the Supreme Court. But it lost only one power by the adjudication of the court, which was fixing a rate for the future to govern the railroad in its operation. Was not that the only power it lost?

Mr. ESCH. Exactly; the gentleman is right. The power to fix a rate for the future was lost, but the power to declare whether the rate was reasonable or unreasonable still remained, with no authority to put its findings into effect.

Mr. CLAYTON. But all other powers, the gathering of statistical information, and making rules other than prescribing the rate, has never been denied by the Supreme Court.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman is right. Its investigations of the Joint Traffic Association, the Northern Securities merger, of the coal strike, of the beef trust, and numerous other unlawful combinations have resulted in focusing public attention upon them and securing the evidence for their successful prosecution. Although it suffered a loss of power, it has justified its cost to the Government. Even the decision in the Maximum Rate case did not result in a useless body. But, Mr. Chairman, it is true that the fact that the Commission lost its power to fix the rate for the future and to enforce the execution thereof diminished the respect and wholesome fear which railroad companies had for the Commission. They no longer put their entire case before the Commission in the event of a complaint and a hearing. It has been said on this floor, and has been often repeated, that the Interstate Commerce Commission rarely if ever has hit the mark in cases of appeal to the Supreme Court. One attorney for the railroads said before our committee that out of thirty-two cases they had hit the bull's-eye once, had come within the circle once, and missed thirty times; but he was unfair in failing to state the circumstances and conditions under which these reversals were obtained. In no less than six of these cases the Commission, insisting upon its rights to declare rates for the future, was overruled. With a multitude of circumstances and conditions surrounding a given contest over any rate or rates, is it wonderful that six cases applying the law should have been brought to the Supreme Court? Fourteen of these thirty cases arose under the long and short haul clause. The Commission was trying to enforce section 4 of the original act and to give it some effect, and thus carry out the purpose of Congress.

The Supreme Court, by these repeated decisions, has refined away the qualifications set forth in section 4, until to-day section 4 is an absolute nullity. These men who criticise the Commission for failing to hit the mark failed themselves to tell the whole truth. They did not tell that since the Maximum Rate case the railroads in many cases had refused to put in their entire testimony before the Commission, but when the case came before the court the defendant companies would put in new evidence which had never been heard by the Commission. On this new evidence the court would make its decisions.

Finally this unwarranted practice became so aggravated that the courts themselves declared they would not decide a case where the evidence had not been first fully presented to the Commission.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. How many cases have been appealed?

Mr. ESCH. There were thirty cases a year ago in which decisions had been made by the Supreme Court reversing the Commission.

Now, in reference to the extent of the present agitation for this legislation. It was said by the learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] that this demand of the President in his message of December, 1904, was "a non sequitur," and that even a busy President might be permitted to indulge in non sequiturs. What did he mean by declaring that the President's message of 1904 was a non sequitur? Did he intend to say, did he imply, that there was no demand in the country, that there was no request being made of Congress for any legislation looking to an increase in the powers of the Commission? I wish to say that the President's declaration in his annual message of a year ago asking Congress to confer "on the Commission the power to revise rates and regulations, the revised rate to go into effect and stay in effect unless and until the court of review reverses it," was not a non sequitur. There were members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who for a year before that message had been urging upon that committee and upon Congress legislation to increase and enlarge the powers of the Commission. I want to say that for the last eight years this important subject has been before the country and committees of Congress had been considering it. In the Fifty-sixth Congress Senator CULLOM introduced a bill giving to the Commission enlarged powers practically along the line of the bill under discussion to-day. His bill was succeeded in the Fifty-seventh Congress by the Nelson-Corliss bill, upon which hearings were had. That, in turn, was succeeded by the Quarles-Cooper bill in the Fifty-eighth Congress, upon which hearings were had; to be in turn succeeded by the bill which my distinguished colleague from Michigan and myself had the honor to present at the last session. That, in turn, is now succeeded by the bill which we are now considering, presented by the able and distinguished chairman of our committee.

Does all this show a non sequitur? Was it a chance thought of the President when he called the attention of the American people to the necessity of this legislation? No; this question had been agitating the minds of the people in various sections of the country for years. The President knew, and for some time must have known, the nature, extent, and volume of this agitation. He knew, as some people of the East do not even yet know, how, especially in the Middle West, the birthplace of national ideas, the birthplace of Republican policies, rate legislation was a burning question, and one which the people, through their legislatures, were settling in the form of law. [Loud applause.] Is it a non sequitur to say that the President "suddenly saw a great light" and therefore inserted this recommendation in his message of December, 1904, when all the papers of the land, when more than a thousand industrial, commercial, and shipping bodies throughout the land had sent petitions, and when more than twelve State legislatures had sent memorials to Congress asking for this identical legislation? No. The President well knew the sentiment of the American people and well knew the extent of the demand back of this legislation. The President of the United States is not narrow; his knowledge of the wants and wishes of his countrymen is not confined to the Atlantic seaboard. He is not "cribbed, cabined, and confined" in his ideas. He knows the United States; he knows every State in the Union as no other President ever has; he became conscious of the popular will, and so made that declaration in his message of 1904. [Loud applause.] And great good did the message do. It gave life to the whole subject of rate control; it gave hope and courage to the friends of this proposition. The first definite results came in the last Congress, when the House took favorable action. The President is with the people in the demand for this legislation, and this House is about to put, so far as it can, his recommendation in the form of a law. He will sign this bill if it reaches him. The House of Representatives will perform its duty and will pass the bill. The question will then remain whether "Mahomet should go to the mountain, or whether the mountain should come to Mahomet." Congress can not afford to adjourn without passing it. I feel confident that rate legislation will be enacted at this session, and that we can go back to our several constituencies and say, "We have tried to do our part."

There were other reasons which brought on this agitation for rate control, some of them deep seated and of slow but certain growth. There is now and for some time has been an opinion among the people that there is a large and unwarranted overcapitalization of railroads. It is generally believed that, while the total capitalization is rated at $12,000,000,000, there is but little more than half of it actual valuation. The conclusion follows that, as dividends and interest must be paid on the stocks and bonds, the money to meet such payments must be derived from the rates, fares, and charges demanded, and that therefore the public is excessively taxed.

It was a knowledge of such stock manipulation and other evils that led the President, in his annual message of December, 1904, to utter these words:

> The Government must in increasing degree supervise and regulate the workings of the railways engaged in interstate commerce, and such increased supervision is the only alternative to an increase of the present evils on the one hand or a still more radical policy on the other.

These words are reenforced by those of similar import in his message of last December. They are the words of a fearless Executive. In these days, when corporate influence seeks through financial contributions to reach the seat of political power, it is a brave thing to say that "the highways of commerce shall remain open to all on equal terms." The President said these words. We expected him to say them. We feel confident that he will make them good. The people further understand that a few men control the railroad interests of the country to-day—that only a hundred men in different directories throughout the land practically have control of 90 per cent of the railroad business and management of the country. And with that tremendous power, exerted by men responsible to nobody but to their stockholders, and sometimes not even to them, the people have a well-founded fear that all may not be well with the Republic if this condition is to continue. The people further understand that competition as originally designed no longer obtains; that railroad companies, by combining into systems, by traffic agreements, by community of interests, by numerous other devices are so far stifling competition that it no longer serves as a regulator of trade and commerce; and this being true, the combination being so extensive that six or seven banking syndicates control 65 per cent of the mileage of the country, the people declare "the Government must enter into the solution of the problem if we are to be saved against an unconscionable despotism." We have a right to demand at the hands of Congress the relief afforded by this legislation.

Now, with reference to the bill here presented, I wish to call attention to the phenomenal fact that it has the almost unanimous indorsement of the Members on both sides of the Chamber and the unanimous indorsement of members of both parties on the committee. A unanimous report ought to insure the passage of any bill. Unanimity in committee was not secured by the sacrifice of principle by any member of it. All were agreed as to the principle, and as to details each yielded something. It is now brought in here really as a nonpartisan measure, and it will receive the support of men of both parties.

This attitude of the American House of Representatives ought to do much toward paving the way for the successful passage of this legislation. Each year's delay will result in an increase of the demand for rate legislation.

It is now presented for your suffrages. I can not take it up in detail, but I wish to call attention to some of its specific features. To my mind, as now drafted it is broad enough to cover express companies. The old law did not reach express companies, but the language of this measure, as indicated on page 3, is broad enough to bring them within its purview. It reads:

> And the term "transportation" shall include cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration or icing, storage, and handling of property transported.

Under the original law the question whether that law extended to express companies was raised within six months after that act went into operation, and by a decision of the Commission, handed down in December, 1887, it was held that under the language of the original act express companies could not be considered as under that act. In stating the decision the Commission used this language:

> So far as the public is concerned, this business—
> That is, of receiving and delivering the goods—
> is wholly done by the express companies, the shipper and receiver of the property having no contract relation with the corporation or the persons owning the railroad or other system of transportation employed, but dealing exclusively with the express companies operating on the route desired, to which alone he looks in case of loss or damage. The express company itself thus becomes a common carrier, employing instrumentalities of commerce in part its own and in part hired from other carriers, but having the responsibilities, duties, liabilities, rights, and liens of a common carrier in its relations with the public. Its position in this respect has been judicially ascertained and is well understood throughout the country, and is not seriously in dispute.

There is need of regulating express companies. While held to be common carriers, they have escaped the restrictions which are imposed upon such carriers. Starting as forwarders of small and valuable packages, their business has grown to enormous proportions until to-day it covers items of traffic from coins to live stock. Most of what they carry is freight, and what they carry deprives the railroads of an equal amount.

These express companies, especially the Adams, United States, American, and Wells-Fargo & Co., have contractural relations with the great railway systems of the country. By the terms of their contracts the latter furnish the cars and haulage, and secure from 40 to 60 per cent of the gross receipts. As such percentage of the gross receipts brings to the carriers a far larger return than would receipts on an equivalent amount of traffic carried as freight the railroads do not complain, but, in fact, are inclined to encourage the express business. This business is a very lucrative one, the dividends of some of these companies being 8 per cent per annum, with additional stock dividends. The total capitalization of these four companies is sixty millions. They have 40,000 agencies, 50,000 employees, and last year handled over 100,000,000 packages, besides 20,000,000 money packages and 7,000,000 money orders.

There is virtually no competition between the companies, and but one express company can do business on a given line of road. Representatives of the Adams and the American express companies have entered the directory of the United States Company. There is no control whatever over the charges they can make, and these charges are three and four times higher than the freight charges would be on the same goods. The only plea for such higher charges is the greater safety and speedier delivery which this service insures.

There seems to be no limit to the activities of the express companies. They are becoming agents for the sale as well as the carriage of goods. In some States where prohibition obtains they act as agents, disposing of liquor in original packages. One of them recently advertised that it would do a commission business handling fruit and meats.

With this enlargement of the scope of their activities, with their irresponsibility as common carriers under existing law, the time has come when Congress, in connection with its control over railroad rates, should extend such control to these companies. Their business is practically railroad business and there is no reason why it could not be carried on successfully by the railroad companies themselves. In fact, this has been done. In Europe the carriers do their own express business and the money they receive from it goes to swell the total of freight receipts and in some measure accounts for the increase of such rates as compared with the freight rates in this country. Under this bill I believe these express companies can be required to file their tariff schedules, and upon complaint made against them the Commission can determine whether the rates they charge are just and reasonable. Under section 20 as amended full reports as to capitalization, indebtedness, amount of business, the schedule of rates and charges, the character of contracts with the railroad companies, and other valuable data necessary to a fair, reasonable, and wise control of these companies can be secured.

It was supposed that the passage of the Elkins Act in February, 1903, providing for the payment of penalties for the giving or receiving of rebates, would suppress this widespread iniquity. Its enactment, however, has not destroyed rebates, but has had a tendency to change their form. The open rebate, with cash payments, is a kind of work too "rough" to be longer practiced, and it has given way to more insidious forms, disguised as damages, claims, commissions, and gifts and the discriminations effected through private car lines. The abolition by the Elkins Act of the imprisonment clauses of the original interstate-commerce act has robbed the law of some of its terrors and restraining influences, although encouragement may thereby have been given to rival railroad officials to inform upon one another. By the advice of Attorney-General Moody, recently given to the United States district attorneys, all prosecutions because of rebates whenever possible were to be brought under the conspiracy statute, which provides for imprisonment, instead of under the Elkins Act. Vigorous prosecutions of this kind in various sections of the country, supplemented by the enactment of the pending bill, will be a serious, and I trust fatal, blow to the whole rebate evil.

The ills from which the shipping and general public have suffered as a result of unjust charges and discriminations connected with industrial and terminal lines, switching, icing, elevation, and refrigeration were less heard of and less complained about prior to the enactment of the Elkins law than since. As these ills arose out of instrumentalities of shipment or carriage and were not due to the carriers themselves, immunity from prosecution under the Elkins Act was claimed. It is to prevent any further claim from such immunity that this bill makes the common carriers themselves solely responsible for all such instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, so that they, irrespective of any contracts or agreements they may have, may be held responsible.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. ESCH. I do.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman under what provision of the present bill the authority over maximum charges of the express companies will be found?

Mr. ESCH. I have read the provision—part of the section on the top of page 3. I think that applies to express companies.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems to me that if the authority is found there, it is by implication.

Mr. ESCH. Well, where you specify in a statute, there is always danger of elimination. If you use general terms, you are more apt to reach what you are after.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the private car line is like the express business, an evolution. Both have grown to large and even overpowering proportions as a result of the neglect or unwillingness of the carriers to supply all the necessary facilities to accommodate the carriage of the products naturally tributary to their lines. But all railroads have not thus surrendered this part of their business to third parties, but have themselves supplied their lines with a sufficient number of special cars of the most approved pattern and in many respects are giving better service than is now being given by the so-called "private car lines." The refrigerator car has come to stay. Whether owned by the railroad itself or by a separate company there is almost constant use for it the year round. In these days, when railroad systems are practically transcontinental, something can be found for these cars to do during the greater portion of the year, and should there be a shortage for any reason on any one system, there is no reason why one company could not secure a supply from other lines, as is constantly done in the case of box cars.

It is the contention of the Armour and other private car lines, for the use of whose cars the carriers pay a rental of three-fourths of a cent a mile, loaded or empty, that a much more systematic and speedy distribution of these cars can be made over a greater territory, and that as a result of this fruits and vegetables can be safely shipped greater distances in better condition, assuring more stable prices to producers and a more even market for the consumers. But in payment for such advantages these private car lines receive, besides the rental from the carriers for the use of their cars, exorbitant prices for the icing of them.

As these private car lines, especially the Armour line, insist upon making exclusive contracts for the use of their cars with railroad companies, producers are placed at the mercy of the car-line companies and must pay whatever price is demanded. The exclusive contract feature of this business creates an absolute monopoly, and subjects whole communities to a tax from which, under existing law, there is no escape.

I wish to read a section of one of these exclusive contracts. It is found in the testimony given before our committee at the last session.

The railroad agrees and obligates itself to use the car-line cars exclusively in the movement of fruit and vegetables under refrigeration from points on the lines of the railways owned, leased, or operated by it during the life of this contract so long as the car line shall furnish sufficient equipment to protect said business.

The railroad agrees to this contract, and the consumers at once feel its monopolistic and, hence, price-raising effects. Charging for icing almost double what the railroads themselves get for freight, charging from 100 to 400 per cent above the cost of the ice, charging in one instance $67.20 for a little over 2 tons of ice, are instances of extortion which a free people ought not to tolerate.

Think of it! the railroad company surrenders an obligation it owes to the general public in not itself furnishing the necessary refrigerator cars to accommodate all the traffic which originates along its line; it surrenders this to an independent company, and permits this independent company, because of supplying the required number and type of cars, to demand of the railroad company in return an exclusive contract for all the refrigerated freight along its road.

A significant instance of an increase of rate for icing charges after the carrier had entered into an exclusive contract is shown by the Pere Marquette case in Michigan. If I remember rightly, the Pere Marquette and Michigan Central roads had been making an icing charge of only $20 per car from Michigan to New York, and of from $7 to $15 per car to Dubuque or St. Paul and Duluth prior to making exclusive contracts with the Armour car-line company; but soon after these exclusive contracts had been entered into the charge per car to New York was raised from $20 to $55, and from Michigan to Dubuque, St. Paul, and Duluth from $7, $12, and $15 up to as high as $35.

These exclusive contracts forbid the shipper having his own cars, icing them at his own expense, when he could get the ice for $2 a ton and even less. This right has been denied the shipper. The exclusive contract prevented the railway company from asserting its independence and the private car line company dominated the situation. I do not believe that any such situation is tolerable under the American system of jurisprudence. [Applause.] For one I believe that we should so legislate as not to permit any such power to do wrong to be permitted in any section of the country. These so-called "icing charges," exorbitant as they are, have been giving the shipping world much trouble because of the uncertainty and insufficiency of the relief. When it was attempted to secure relief the private car line companies said: "Why, we are not interstate carriers; the interstate-commerce act does not apply to us; this refrigeration of cars is a purely local matter. We have stations along the line of road stocked with ice from which the bunkers of the cars are filled, but all this is purely a local matter." This is their contention; hence, not being concerned with interstate commerce, the interstate-commerce act could not apply, the Elkins Act could not apply, and the shippers, producers, and consumers are left remediless. If this bill becomes a law, however, it will be broad enough in its application to subject these companies to the restraint of law, it will compel them to give public notice of their tariff schedules and changes therein, and what is more, will compel them to separately note upon their bills of lading their icing charges, so that the shipper will know the amount of ice supplied him and the price he pays for the same. If there was nothing else in this bill than the provision giving a remedy against these private car lines I would most earnestly support it.

This crying demand for relief from the exactions of private car lines comes not merely from the commission merchants throughout the country, but also from the large fruit growing districts of Arkansas, Missouri, Georgia, California, and other sections. As a result of this appeal and doubtless in anticipation of the passage of necessary rate legislation this very week representatives of the Santa Fe road and of the Armour refrigerator service have agreed upon a reduction of rates on fruit from California points to Eastern markets varying from $10 to $17.50 per car. A remarkable feature of this agreement is "that no rebates or other special concessions shall be granted to any fruit shipper in California, and that the reduced rates shall be strictly maintained."

The passage of this bill will place the charges for terminal tracks and switching and industrial lines within the jurisdiction of the Commission. When a great industrial corporation, doing a vast annual freight business, owns and controls a spur track a fraction of a mile in length connecting with trunk lines, it can, under the guise of a joint tariff, secure in return for routing its freight over a given line a certain amount per car as payment for use of its spur track. This charge is out of all proportion to what the spur track bears to the through route, but carriers pay the same in order to secure the business. This undue share of the through route is nothing but a species of rebate to the industrial company, and gives it by so much an advantage over all other companies engaged in the same locality in the same line of business.

This bill will permit the Commission to grant speedy relief to shippers who allege that they have been unjustly discriminated against in withholding facilities of shipment, such as spur-track connections, car allotments, etc., for we give the Commission in this bill the power to determine and order "what regulation or practice in respect to transportation is just, fair, and reasonable."

By requiring thirty days' public notice of a change of rates the rank injustice of the midnight schedule from which the Middle West has suffered in recent years will be curbed, if not entirely checked. Under the existing law only three days' notice of a reduction of rates is required. This short notice permits the railroad company to enter into secret negotiations with large grain dealers or owners of elevator lines for hauling to market vast quantities of produce within a short space of time and at a lower rate. As soon as the produce has been hauled the carrier gives the ten days' notice now required for an increase of the rate. In the meantime, however, the smaller buyers and independent concerns, not knowing of a contemplated reduction in the rate, are unable to take advantage of the reduction and are thus made to suffer loss. A thirty days' notice, as required in the pending bill, will give ample opportunity for all to be apprised of the change of rate, and will place all upon an equal footing.

To my mind, the crux of this legislation is contained in section 4, which amends section 15 of the original act by giving to the Commission the power "to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed as the maximum to be charged" in any given case where complaint has been made and a hearing had. It is this grant of power around which the contention with reference to rate regulation has raged for the last year. Those favoring the proposition do so because of their conviction that the time has come when the Government must assert the power given it under the Constitution to provide the necessary safeguards against railroad combinations. Those who oppose it do so in the belief that it will establish a dangerous precedent, that it is contrary to our economic traditions, will lead to abuse, and as a result will affect disastrously the railroad interests of the United States. I am not at all persuaded that any such result will follow. It has not followed in any of the twenty-four States which have adopted more or less rigid laws for the regulation of railroads within their respective borders. In my own State a rate law was enacted a year ago more drastic and far-reaching than has yet been enacted by any State save possibly Texas. Since this law went into effect no injurious results have followed—railroad business is as prosperous now as ever—nor has the law lessened the wages of railroad employees.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. I recognize the gentleman as one of the fathers of this bill, and so I desire to ask him a question. What provision is there in this bill for appeal by the railroad company against whom a decree has been passed by the Commission—against whom the Commission has found a rate to be unreasonable and has fixed a new rate?

Mr. ESCH. I have that provision, if the gentleman will permit me to follow my own line of argument.

Mr. PALMER. I would like to ask the gentleman practically how the railroad company is going to get an appeal or get a chance for a rehearing?

Mr. ESCH. The provisions of the bill allow any change or modification to be made of a given rate——

Mr. PALMER. By the Commission?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; and if the railroad company feels aggrieved it can go into court and secure relief on the ground——

Mr. PALMER. But who will be the defendant in that case? Suppose the railroad wants to go into court, who is going to be the defendant?

Mr. ESCH. Under the provisions of the bill the Government assumes the load when the carrier enjoins the going into effect of the rate fixed by the Commission.

Mr. PALMER. The Government?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; the cost in this case is at the expense of the Government, the Attorney-General——

Mr. PALMER. The district attorneys are charged with prosecuting these penalties.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose a railroad company wants to take an appeal, wants to have the reasonableness of the rate which is declared to be unreasonable adjudged by somebody else; who is to be the defendant in that case? Is it the Interstate Commerce Commission or is it the complainant?

Mr. ESCH. I should say it would be the Commission. Its action could be enjoined by the court and would be defended at Government expense.

Mr. PALMER. If it is the Interstate Commerce Commission who is going to pay the expenses, who is going to hire the lawyers for the Commission?

Mr. ESCH. I understand that is paid out of the general fund.

Mr. PALMER. Is there anything in the bill that provides any such thing?

Mr. ESCH. I believe there is.

Mr. PALMER. I would like to have the gentleman point it out.

Mr. ESCH. Notice is required, before either reducing or raising a rate, of thirty days.

Mr. PALMER. This bill provides for every offense, for every violation of a decree of the Commission, that there shall be a penalty of $5,000 for every offense. Well, any railroad company worth considering would violate a decree about a thousand times a day, I suppose, and there is a penalty of $5,000 for every offense——

Mr. ESCH. Yes——

Mr. PALMER. Now, pending an appeal or pending an ascertainment of the question whether this Commission is right or not, would these penalties accumulate? I will not ask the gentleman to stop and look for it——

Mr. ESCH. I was finding that provision as to the fund out of which prosecutions were to be paid, but we make provision for that in the bill itself.

Mr. PALMER. On page 15 it is provided:

> It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures. The costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

Now, the question I am asking is, If a railroad company goes into court who is going to be the defendant, who is the proceeding to be against, and who is to pay the cost of that proceeding on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission, if the Interstate Commerce Commission is to be the defendant?

Mr. ESCH. My idea is, the Interstate Commerce Commission is the defendant, and the cost is to be paid out of the general fund provided in the bill.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman refer me to any line or any place where such a provision is to be found, or any place where an appeal is given to a railroad company under any circumstances?

Mr. ESCH. As I stated, the main proposition of this legislation lies in this grant of power to the Commission. We do not attempt to change the procedure in the courts. We have not added to nor taken from them any of their constitutional rights, and if the Commission exceeds the rightful authority conferred upon it carriers can secure relief through the courts.

On the ground that Congress has the right to regulate commerce between the several States and because the railroads are public highways, we have the right to enact this law. As the basis for this declaration I wish to read a part of a decision of Judge Harlan in the so-called "Nebraska case."

A railroad is a public highway, and none the less so because constructed and maintained through the agency of a corporation deriving its existence and powers from the State. Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the State. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public. It is therefore under governmental control, subject, of course, to the constitutional guaranties for the protection of its property.

Many years ago Justice Bradley, of the Supreme Court, made this statement:

A superintending power over the highways and the charges imposed upon the public for their use have always remained in the Government. This is not only its indefeasible right, but it is necessary for the protection of the people against extortion and abuse.

This is the principle which guided us in placing only upon complaint and after hearing this power in the Commission, and being justified on constitutional grounds, we have no hesitancy in presenting this measure to you for your support. There is no such danger arising from the exercise of this power by Congress as has been predicted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] or the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL]. I have no sympathy with the dolorous forecasts of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Scholarly and eminent in his way, he seems to be born on anti lines and his independence is one of the chief characteristics in him which we admire. I have no fear that these dangers will ensue if we enact this provision. As I have already stated, disaster did not ensue in the twenty-four States where commissions were given powers not merely of regulation, but even of rate initiation. Disaster did not follow the original enactment in 1887. There was no widespread ruin. There was no going into bankruptcy by the railroads of the country. In fact, an era of prosperity ensued. The gentlemen to whom I have just referred cited to us as a horrible example the case of Germany as a reason why we should not enact this legislation. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and also the gentleman from Massachusetts have taken their ideas with reference to the German system of railway management from Prof. H. R. Meyer, of the University of Chicago, as set forth in his book, Government Regulation of Railway Rates. I question somewhat the authority of Professor Meyer, and I do so upon the statements of men (which I will publish as a part of my remarks) who are familiar with the German system of operation and ownership because of residence or actual knowledge.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Have not the great railroad systems of the country flooded the mails with such works as Professor Meyer's and with similar literature against this proposed legislation?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman is quite right.

Mr. CLAYTON. All ex parte, and all of which tells only a part of the truth and does not disclose the whole case as we have it before us to-day in the Congress.

Mr. ESCH. I quite agree with the gentleman from Alabama. And I will quote from an unquestioned authority with reference to Professor Meyer's statements relative to the operation of the German railway system. I quote from the words of Dr. Alfred von der Leyen, a member of the Prussian ministry of public works, being part of his recent review of Professor Meyer's book. He says:

For a long time there has been no difference of opinion in Germany that a State railway system deserves the preference over private railway systems. Professor Meyer apparently can not realize that it is the duty of the State to administer the great monopolies of transportation as a unified system in accordance with the principle of the welfare of the great masses. The professor continually moves about in contradictions, declaring on one page that the State can make tariffs only with the yardstick, and on the next criticising it for making certain exceptions. He also confuses his readers continually by rehearsing the difficulties which are encountered in adjusting certain tariffs in such a manner that they will be beneficial on the one hand and not injurious on the other, and then carefully omitting to tell how the State has succeeded in nearly every case cited by him in arriving at a satisfactory solution, to be sure only after a very careful investigation of all the circumstances entering into the situation. And whether this method of procedure, which may sometimes be a little tedious, deserves the preference over the practice obtaining in America according to which the great railways judge economic questions chiefly by their own subjective estimates and from the viewpoint of their own interests or that of favored shippers, is a matter with respect to which no German, and I am convinced also many American traffic men are not in the least in doubt.

In listening to the arguments of these distinguished Members of the House one would infer that German trade was stagnant, that cities once powerful were going into decay, and that the mighty Empire itself was on the decline. What is the truth? What nation of Europe has made the greatest progress in commerce and manufactures in Europe in the last two decades? Germany. What nation has become our greatest competitor in the world's markets? Germany. What nation has the most highly developed internal commerce? Germany. If there are tears to shed, do not waste them on Germany.

I will supplement Dr. von der Leyen's criticism with a statement made by Mr. B. H. Meyer, who is no relative of the professor, but was for sometime a Government statistician and is now an able member of the State railway commission of Wisconsin. Both of these gentlemen agree as to the operation of the railroad system in Germany, while Prof. H. R. Meyer, who pretends to superior knowledge, confessed to the Senate investigating committee, upon inquiry made by Senator CLAPP, that he had never been in Germany, but that his information came from printed reports. The reviews I shall print are from men who have actual knowledge of the situation.

But why go so far afield as have the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Massachusetts? Why go to New Zealand and Australia? Let us stay at home, where we can see an illustration of the operation of a similar law in a neighboring country of ours, the great Dominion of Canada. Canada has had a rate law on her statute books for a little over a year. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] yesterday said that it has been in operation only a little over a year, but that this was hardly time enough for us to determine its defects or its merits. The railroad attorneys, on the other hand, who appeared before the Senate committee declared that if Congress gave the Commission the power to fix a rate for the future the railroad property and interests would go to ruin inside of three months. The Canadian law, in a country like our own, with railroads constructed like our own, with the same rolling stock as in our own, is operating exceedingly well. According to the testimony of Mr. Bickerdike, a member of the Canadian Parliament, Canada has a railway commission which really controls. It has got power, not only over rates and schedules and classifications, but it has got power over the construction of roads, over the speed of trains.

We do not assume to give our Commission any such powers in this bill—far from it. He says:

Canada has a railway commission which really controls. Its powers are as absolute as legislation can make them, and anyone reading the daily papers of the country may see constantly how these powers are being exercised in the interests of the people. The commission has been in control for over a year now, not a very long time, perhaps, but long enough to satisfy the people that a court of this nature is an absolute necessity.

And again:

Instance after instance might be mentioned to show how satisfactorily the board has attended to the appeals of the shippers. Not all appeals have been granted; many have been unjust to the railways. Many other cases have been adjusted by a meeting between the railways and the commissioners.

And again:

It may be objected by many in the United States that the railroads there will gain their ends by bribing the commissioners. The safeguards in Canada against this are the character of the commissioners and the tariff officer, their high office and liberal remuneration, the importance of the business interests at stake, and the publicity given to the appeals made to the board and to its decisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes more of time to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ESCH. It is needless to say that if Canada can get good men—men who will not be subject to bribery or yield to political influence in order to enforce this railway commission law—this country can secure talent, ability, and integrity of the same kind. We do not yield first place to Canada in this particular. In that Dominion, with a drastic rate law, there has been no injury to railroad interests. In fact, on consulting the railway statistics and financial reports, I find that in the last year railway stocks and bonds have increased in value, while the gross earnings of its railroads have also increased. Now, with this example at our door, with the fact that disaster has not followed when drastic laws have been enacted in a majority of the States, that no misfortune came to the country after 1887, and during the time the Commission exercised the power of declaring what was and enforcing a reasonable rate, what need we fear from the operation of this bill should it be enacted? This is wise legislation, framed along conservative lines—lines which if carried out will prove to the advantage of the shipping and general public.

I have noticed that railroad labor organizations have been protesting against the enactment of this law, and representatives of these orders came before the President two or three months ago and requested him to desist from his fixed purpose of urging this legislation upon Congress. I can not agree with the premises which these organizations present. I can not see how the enactment of this law will adversely affect them. They fear that if this law is passed railroad receipts will be impaired and consequently railway wages will be reduced. When in the history of American railroads have the wages of railway employees borne a fixed ratio to the income of the roads? Have railway employees upon some of these lines which have been recapitalized into millions ever obtained any benefit from the effects of that action? No; their increase in wage has seldom been proportionate to the increase of income and profit of these great corporations. Their wages depend upon their organization and the law of supply and demand. The passage of this bill will not be inimical to their interests, nor to the interests of any road honestly administered, in my humble judgment.

The almost unanimous belief in the passage of some form of rate regulation at this session has not discouraged railroad construction planned for the present year. On the contrary, the present year is destined to surpass all others in new mileage, in permanent improvements, and in the purchase of equipment. Some of the leading railway officials of the country do not believe rate regulation will have disastrous effects. President Ingalls, of the Big Four, recently declared:

I do not look for any unfavorable effect from Federal rate supervision on the earnings and conditions of the railways.

General Manager Miller, of the Wabash system, states that—

It is doubtful whether Federal rate supervision would have any effect on traffic conditions.

And I understand that President Stickney, of the Chicago Great Western, is of like mind. In this connection it is proper to state that Chairman Knapp, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, believes that—

The proposed rate legislation will not have any material effect on railway revenues nor in anywise disturb the fundamental conditions of railway operation. Indeed, I believe that effective rate regulation will prove a benefit to railway interests.

With reference to the great subject involved in this debate as to the constitutional right of Congress to delegate power to the Commission, I wish to say simply that on the strength of the Mississippi case, the Texas and Pacific case, the Nebraska case, the old case of McCulloch against the State of Maryland, the case of the Milwaukee road against the commissioners of Minnesota, on this question I firmly believe that Congress, having passed the rule that the rate should be just and reasonable, can empower the Commission to see that the rates are made to conform to that standard. These cases are analogous to the case in 192 U. S. Reports, the so-called "tea case." In that case Congress had passed a law by which teas of a certain low grade should be prohibited from entering the United States, and empowered the Secretary of the Treasury, through a commission or board of appraisers, to determine what teas could come in and what teas could not. The commission rejected certain teas as being below the standard. The importers brought suit, claiming that this was a delegation of legislative authority to the commissioners or appraisers, and therefore unconstitutional. The Supreme Court declared that Congress, having fixed the standard, to wit, that teas of a certain grade only should be allowed to enter, had fixed a rule; that the commissioners or appraisers only were empowered to see that the rule was observed; that it was a delegation of authority to an administrative board, and that the board of appraisers, acting under the rule, acted within its constitutional limitations.

I believe that on all such orders of the Commission a review should be had only where the rate or charge fixed by the Commission is unlawful or is confiscatory.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question just on that point, whether the rate fixed by the Commission that would be unreasonable is necessarily confiscatory?

Mr. ESCH. No; I would think the jurisdiction of the court would only arise on the rate being confiscatory.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And on none of the rates that might lie between the point of confiscation and extortion, the court would not have the power to investigate. Is that the gentleman's construction?

Mr. ESCH. I would limit the jurisdiction of the court to the lawfulness of the Commission's order.

The courts, as has been repeatedly decided, can not be invested with the power of making the rates for the future, this being a purely legislative function, the province of the court being confined to the question of the lawfulness of the rate, and the court exhausts its power when it decides this question. I believe that any attempt to give the court the power to declare the extent of the unreasonableness of a rate, and thereby fix the rate, would be unconstitutional; nor would it be safe to permit the court to certify to the Commission what it deems the lawful rate, and that the Commission should thereupon publish the rate so certified to it by the court and make it the future rate. As long as we may be sure of our constitutional grounds and are convinced that we are acting within constitutional limitations, why hazard this entire legislation by the injection of some feature which may nullify the whole?

Expedition in the hearing of complaints is a prime requisite in rate regulation. The bill secures this by putting in force and effect the orders of the Commission thirty days after notice, and such order is to remain in force and be observed by the carrier unless suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or suspended or set aside by the court, and in case the matter in controversy is taken into the court the provisions of the expediting act under the Sherman trust law are made applicable to the proceedings, so that a decision is made at the earliest possible moment by practically an appellate court, in which court, as well as in the Supreme Court, the matter has precedence over all causes save criminal causes. When it is remembered that under the existing law cases have remained pending in the court from four to eight and even nine years, and when decisions had been finally rendered were of little or no avail because of an entire change in the conditions which originally brought on the litigation, speedy decision becomes a consummation devoutly to be wished.

Mr. Chairman, your committee realized that in order to make rate regulation through the Interstate Commerce Commission effective; in order to secure the suppression of rebates and unlawful discriminations and preferences; in order to secure the necessary evidence to make prosecutions for such offenses successful, it was necessary to give to the Commission visitatorial powers of the broadest and most thorough character. We believe that section 7, amending section 20 of the original interstate-commerce act, gives the Commission through its own members and through its special agents and examiners these powers.

At present almost every carrier has its own system of bookkeeping and there is uniformity among carriers only in the method of publishing the reports at present required by law. Uniformity in bookkeeping would greatly lessen the task of Government inspection. It is for this reason that we have provided in this bill that—

The Commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by carriers subject to the provisions of this act, including the accounts, records, and memoranda of the movement of traffic as well as the receipts and expenditures of moneys.

And it is further provided that—

The Commission shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, and memoranda kept by carriers subject to this act, and it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, and memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the Commission.

In order that complete and accurate statistics of railways may be secured for the information of the public, not only annually, but at any time, this bill requires all carriers subject to this act to file annual, monthly, and even special reports on forms to be prescribed by the Commission. The necessity for a uniform system of bookkeeping as to accounts, records, and memoranda kept by carriers and the necessity of annual, monthly, and special reports of their earnings and expenses and the right of thorough and frequent inspection on the part of the agents of the Government is shown by the loose and deceptive methods practiced by many carriers in the keeping and publication of their accounts.

In recent years so great have been the actual gross and net earnings of some of the railroads that efforts have been made to conceal them, with a view to deceive the general public and thereby to silence any demand for a reduction of rates, fares, and charges. There are many methods whereby gross and net earnings are minimized by charging up to operating expenses items which should have been charged up to permanent improvements. President Baer, of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, admitted that a steel bridge on his line was charged up to operating expenses. On other roads brick depot buildings and other structures and spur and side tracks are not charged up to permanent improvements, but to operating expenses. Other accounts wherein like concealment of the true situation is practiced are the loss and damage accounts, accounts for the repairs and renewals of locomotives, of passenger and freight cars. These several accounts on examination will show enormous increases wholly out of proportion to operating expenses. Such unfair methods, such padding of accounts, will not be possible should this bill become a law.

In order to show the necessity of publicity of railway accounts and of railway management I shall append and make a part of my remarks a statement prepared by Hon. Charles S. Hanks, of Boston, assisted by George W. R. Harriman, an engineer of large experience, of the same city. These gentlemen, after months of labor and with access to all Government statistics relating to railways, have come to the conclusion that it would be possible to make a uniform reduction of 10 per cent on railway rates, fares, and charges throughout the country without such reduction interfering in any way with the present rate of dividends on stocks, interest on bonds, or wages of railway employees. That such reduction is possible is shown by the readjustment of accounts of two roads—the Southern and the New York, New Haven and Hartford. A like investigation of three other great railway systems in other parts of the country leads to the same conclusion.

If, as Judge Harlan declared in the Nebraska case, the carrier is entitled to a fair return upon his investment, ought not the Commission and, in case of appeal, the court take into consideration not merely the question of overcapitalization, but also the question of the padding of accounts?

No one denies the prosperous condition of the railroads of the country during the last few years, and especially since the general raising of rates through reclassifications in official southern and western territory, beginning in January, 1900. Had the rates and classifications in force prior to that date remained, the revenues of the railroads last year would have been less by over $100,000,000.

I am not in any sense a railroad baiter. I concede to the railroads the right to live and prosper, and in return ask a like concession from them to the people. I would ask them to remember that old maxim, "So use thine own as not to injure thy neighbor." With so much of their own and so much which the people out of their generosity have given them and which they have used as their own, I respectfully ask that they do not injure their neighbors—the amassed millions of our population, each one of whom in comparison has so very little.

We believe that the Commission appointed by the President under this act—a commission of seven members—will be a nonpartisan commission, a commission of men of high integrity and of high ability. It will not be a political body. There is no more reason why it should be charged with being such a body than is the Supreme Court of the United States. Its members are named by the President; they are confirmed by the Senate.

It is charged that this agitation, not springing from the people, has risen out of the lust of power on the part of the present Commissioners. Gentlemen, when they have been appealed to under an emasculated statute, when they have been harassed by appeals for aid from all parts of the country and knew that their hands were tied and they could not afford relief, do you wonder that for ten years in annual reports they have appealed to Congress to give them the power which Congress supposed it had originally delegated? I would think them less than human if they had not done this, if they had not in good faith tried to magnify their office. We can get men for the Commission who will give to the interpretation and administration of this act the greatest ability, the widest knowledge, and the results, I have no doubt, will be beneficial to the country. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

APPENDIX 1.

Statement of Hon. Charles S. Hanks, of Boston, Mass.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN AND HARTFORD RAILROAD.

Station service.

1900	$3,777,000
1901	3,885,000
1902	4,133,000
1903	4,602,000
1904	4,714,000
1905	4,670,000

The above is approximately $2,180,000 a year more than it should be on the percentage basis of this item of disbursements to the total disbursements and is undoubtedly largely padded.

Car service per diem and mileage (rentals).

1900	$688,000
1901	687,000
1902	772,000
1903	1,230,000
1904	1,094,000
1905	1,555,000

The above is approximately $500,000 a year more then it should be on the percentage basis of this item of disbursements to the total disbursements and is undoubtedly largely padded.

In the last report published the outstanding bonds were $9,639,000, paying, approximately, annually $385,560 in interest. The stock outstanding was $80,000,000, paying a yearly dividend of $6,400,000. If the liabilites of the road were carried on practically the same percentage basis as the other roads of the country, and if these bonds had been increased to the amount of $44,814,500, namely, one-half of the bond and stock issue, there would have been an annual saving to the road of over $1,400,000, even if the bonds and stocks had been sold as low as par. Why this was not done is obvious. In a word, the freight and passenger rates could have been reduced $4,430,000 a year and the road still pay its employees the same wages and the stockholders the same dividends. That this reduction could be made is indicated from the fact that the Great Northern road, which runs through a sparsely settled section, is operated for 48.40 per cent of its income, and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, which has a density of traffic, costs 71.89 per cent of its income to operate it.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Loss and damage.

1900	$385,000
1901	415,000
1902	491,000
1903	698,000
1904	941,000
1905	1,090,000

The above is approximately $375,000 a year more than it should be on the percentage basis of this item of disbursements to the total disbursements, and is undoubtedly largely padded.

Injury to person.

1900	$261,000
1901	350,000
1902	510,000
1903	728,000
1904	962,000
1905	1,125,000

The above is approximately $358,000 a year more than it should be on the percentage basis of this item of disbursements to the total disbursements, and is undoubtedly padded.

Repairs and renewals of locomotives.

1900	$1,687,000
1901	1,722,000
1902	1,912,000
1903	2,891,000
1904	3,173,000
1905	3,063,331

The above is approximately $377,000 a year more than it should be on the percentage basis of this item of disbursements to the total disbursements, and is undoubtedly padded.

Repairs and renewals of passenger cars.

1900	$656,000
1901	696,000
1902	745,000
1903	826,000
1904	809,000
1905	868,000

The above is approximately $193,000 a year more than it should be on the percentage basis of this item of disbursements to the total disbursements, and is undoubtedly padded.

Repairs and renewals of freight cars.

1900	$1,922,000
1901	2,188,000
1902	2,556,000
1903	2,772,000
1904	2,879,000

The above is approximately $477,000 a year more than it should be on the percentage basis of this item of disbursements to the total disbursements, and is undoubtedly padded.

The returns of the Southern Railway show that it increased its assets between 1900 and 1905 $67,000,000, as follows: By the purchase of stock and bonds of other roads, $27,000,000; by new cost of road, $16,000,000; by new equipment, $5,000,000; by miscellaneous property, $16,000,000; by cash and current assets, $3,000,000. The offset to this $67,000,000 is shown by issuing $51,000,000 bonds without any additional stock issue, the balance of $16,000,000 coming from the earnings of the road. In a word, the freight and passenger rates could have been reduced $3,200,000 a year and the road still pay the employees the same wages and the stockholders the same dividends. That this reduction could be made is indicated from the fact that the Great Northern Railroad is operated for 48.40 per cent of its income and the Southern Railroad for 69.99 per cent of its income.

APPENDIX 2.

Hugo Richard Meyer, assistant professor of political economy in the University of Chicago. Government regulation of railway rates. A study of the experience of the United States, Germany, France, Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Australia. New York, 1905. The Macmillan Company. XXVII u. 486 S. 8.

[Translation of a review by Dr. Alfred von der Leyen, of the Prussian ministry of public works, Berlin, published in the Archiv für Eisenbahnwesen for January-February 1906.]

The author is a decided opponent of state railway systems and of all regulation of railways and railway tariffs by the government, for it is the verdict of all experience that governments will not and can not make railway rates that will meet the needs of expanding trade and industry. (P. XVII.) A most emphatic and very harsh verdict which this professor (care should be taken not to confound him with Prof. Balthasar H. Meyer, now railway commissioner of Wisconsin) attempts to prove from the experiences which Germany, Austria-Hungary, France, Russia, and Australia have made with government-made freight tariffs and in the United States with company-made tariffs. According to our author, we find on the one hand, in the countries in which the state influences the tariffs, heavy shadows, dense mediæval darkness, while on the other hand, the privately made tariffs of the United States reflect nothing but clear light, sparkling sunshine, which would beam still more brightly if the error had not been made in the United States of restricting the freedom of the exemplary private railways through the enactment of the interstate-commerce law and the institution of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Part I of Professor Meyer's book, composed of eight chapters, pages 1 to 203, depicts the pernicious effect of state railway tariffs, while Part II, pages 203 to 473, portrays the magnificent, overwhelming economic results of the far-sighted tariff policy of the railways of the United States.

This is undoubtedly an entirely new conception, new not only for the German, but also for the American reader. It is seldom that an American has the opportunity of reading such a spirited song of praise regarding his own railways and such a hard, depreciative judgment with respect to the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is charged with the supervision of rates affecting interstate traffic by the interstate-commerce act of February 4, 1887.

It is a different question whether the author has succeeded in proving his case. This question is of greater interest to American than to German readers. During the winter of 1905 President Roosevelt himself launched a movement against the existing tariff policy of the American railways. The President has expressed the opinion that the tariff policy affects the common interest unfavorably; he regards it necessary that the Federal Government exercise a more effective supervision of these tariffs, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission receive enlarged powers over the railways. A bill embodying these views passed the House of Representatives, but not the Senate. In May and June of 1905 the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce had extended hearings on the subject, and the testimony is published in five large volumes. The message to Congress of December, 1905, again called the attention of that body, with still more emphatic words, to the necessity of controlling railway tariffs through public authority. Whether the President will succeed remains to be seen. At all events, he has succeeded in greatly arousing public opinion and has created anxiety on the part of the powerful railway managements. A rescuer has arisen for these railways in the person of Mr. Meyer, who, armed with what has the appearance of a mighty scientific armament, attempts to show how objectionable the efforts of the Government of his fatherland have been.

However, the first part of his book was written and published before President Roosevelt had advanced his views. Meyer's studies concerning state railway tariffs in European states and in Australia appeared between July 10 and October 9, 1903, in that excellent American publication, the Railway Age; also the chapter on Prussian tariff policy, concerning which the author deems it prudent to remain silent in his preface (P. IX). The short chapter on France (pp. 123 to 136) is new. If the author did not resolve until later to oppose the railway policy of his Government, he naturally could make good use of these articles. In his testimony before the Senate committee on the 4th and 5th of May, 1905 (vol. 2, pp. 1552 et seq. of the report), the author repeated much of that which he had theretofore written in these articles.

If in the following review I enter upon details more than would be necessary for German readers, regarding Professor Meyer's utterance with respect to state railway rate policy, I do so in the hope that these lines may also come under the observation of American readers. In my estimation it can not be a matter of indifference to us that views like these, presented with great confidence and apparently resting upon thorough investigations, should take root in the United States. The railway questions which at present are agitating America have only academic interest for us.

Let us see upon what the author bases his derogatory verdict regarding the freight tariffs of the Prussian state railways. Not by the method of presenting to the Americans the German tariff system, German basal rates, etc., and then attempt to prove that this system is an erroneous one; that rates are incorrectly formed; that trade and industry generally suffer from these rates, and are incapable of adequate development, etc. Rather he contents himself with saying in two pages (pp. 3–5) that our freight rates are composed of two parts, terminal charges and movement expenses. The remainder of his discussion is intended to show, on the basis of a few examples taken from German, partially very prejudiced, sources that under such a system it is impossible to avoid conflicts between different branches of industry and industrial sections, and that the effective competition of railways with waterways is thereby prevented. The fundamental defect of Prussian rates, according to the author, is their lack of elasticity, that they are not constructed on a falling scale, and that they can not be thus constructed in accordance with the accepted principles. However, on the same page on which the author advances this bold assertion he has the misfortune to cite Special Tariff III, which is constructed on a falling scale. In addition to these regular tariffs, as is well known, piece-goods rates and express piece-goods rates are tapering rates; and there lies before me a compilation which shows that in May last there were not less than 61 commodity rates, including those for the most important bulky goods (wood, all kinds of raw material, fertilizers, ores, etc.), which were constructed on the falling scale; and carload rates on live stock are tapering rates. It is therefore a gross misrepresentation of facts, when the author says:

"And to-day in Prussia their introduction is opposed by two powerful forces. One of these is the Prussian Government's fear of temporary or permanent loss of revenue; the other, the jealousy of the sectional interests and trade interests that are concerned about the preservation of the established course of trade and industry."

Among the examples of erroneous tariff construction which Meyer recites, the first is the cancellation of the tapering rates on grain, which were withdrawn in the year 1894 in order to make possible the ratification of the Russian treaty of commerce of that time. This example is chosen not without skill, since uncertainty existed then, and even to-day opinions differ with respect to the correctness of this procedure. But it proves nothing with respect to the inability of the State to make railway tariffs, because in cases where such complications of economic policy did not exist the older tapering grain rates were maintained (such as the graded mileage rates of the Prussian Eastern Railway)—indeed, new tapering rates for the export of grain were introduced, which fact, however, was known to Professor Meyer. The second illustration he claims to find in the export rates on sugar. It is true that their adoption was preceded by extensive investigations, but nevertheless they were finally introduced, as he himself states on page 15. And with this all his preceding assertions fall to the ground. On page 16 he claims that the restriction on workmen's return tickets is connected with this question. Herein lies a remarkable misunderstanding. Meyer confuses the return tickets of laborers with the reductions in party tickets for the so-called "season laborers" who, it is true, are attracted in part by beet culture. But in both cases the question is one of beets. The reduced rates for the so-called "season laborers" have never been canceled. They exist to-day.

Then Professor Meyer takes up the question of the ore tariffs from Lorraine-Luxemburg to Westphalia. Before their introduction, too, difficulties had to be overcome; and the question was investigated very thoroughly, but finally, on June 1, 1901, they were introduced, and this Mr. Meyer conceals. And with this the entire edifice, constructed from material brought together from many sources, collapses. The author in his statements has confused fact and fiction to such an extent that it would require considerably more space to uncover his errors in detail than these through-and-through confused statements themselves occupy, and out of all of which only this remains true, that there are in Prussia, as in all parts of the world, people who are dissatisfied with certain rates and desire reductions.

The second chapter is devoted chiefly to a discussion of the competition of railways and waterways. Professor Meyer considers it the duty of the railways to maintain the strongest possible competition with waterways. That this competition is not directed more strenuously against the Rhine, the Elbe, or the Oder, meets with his disapproval, and he can not understand why the railways should permit the natural waterways to carry an increasing tonnage. It is their duty, according to his views, to adjust their tariffs in such a manner that all freight is hauled by the railways and the waterways lie waste. Furthermore, the author can not understand why the Prussian Government does not favor the Prussian port of Stettin by means of railway tariffs in such a manner that it can compete more effectually than heretofore with Hamburg. On page 45 he states that—

"While the Prussian Government and the German people generally believe it a patriotic act to cut railway rates against foreign cities, such as Rotterdam, they would not approve any departure from their uniform system of rates for the purpose of strengthening one German city as against another."

Naturally, Meyer considers it equally absurd to construct a canal between Stettin and Berlin. It is entirely incomprehensible to him why the State railways did not prevent the deflection of a large part of the petroleum trade of Bremen to the waterways. It is not enough for him that low commodity rates on petroleum are in force from Bremen to southern and western Germany, although even these low rates are frequently met by the tank ships via Rotterdam and the Rhine. This struggle for the petroleum trade should have led to the reduction of rates by rail also to the east, to Berlin, and to Madgeburg. In consequence of this mistaken rate policy the oil trade has been driven from Bremen to Hamburg.

That with such views Professor Meyer is a still more pronounced opponent of artificial waterways and of canal construction is not surprising. In the fourth chapter a short summary is given of the various attempts to carry a canal bill through the Prussian Parliament during the last few years. He advances the same objections to the first two canal bills which were urged by opponents of canals with us. The fate of the last canal bill is not mentioned. No mention is made of the fact that in the elaboration of this bill an attempt was made to overcome the objections of the opponents to the canal and to incorporate provisions whereby the cooperation of rail and water ways was to be assured in the future for the general welfare. All these difficult questions have been thoroughly and exhaustively discussed within the last few years, in parliament as well as in the daily and technical press. Nor are they unknown to the American public. I need only to recall the fight for the improvement of the Erie Canal, the competition of the railways with the Great Lakes, and the plans for an artificial waterway from the Great Lakes to the Mississippi. In Germany and in Prussia the question has long been viewed from a higher plane, even during the time in which private railways still existed. The opinion has always obtained that the natural waterways had a right to exist alongside the railways. The interests of traffic in general have been rated higher than the exclusive financial interests of the railways. Whether or not the waterways have occasionally not been favored too much is a question which I do not desire to discuss on this occasion. At all events, the railway traffic has developed substantially alongside the waterways, and, to put it mildly, it is gross exaggeration on the part of Professor Meyer when he maintains that the Prussian railways have been degraded into mere feeders for the waterways. But this question also is certainly not connected with the assumed inferiority of the State in making rates as compared with private enterprise. The illustration of the commodity rates on sugar which Professor Meyer presents proves exactly the opposite. Furthermore, the fierce wars of the American trunk lines for the grain trade on the Erie Canal are by no means a glorious page in the history of American railway tariffs.

The third chapter of Meyer's book deals with the financial policy of the Prussian railways, which are accused, by means of arguments well known here and amply refuted, of being operated too much in the interests of the State Treasury. In this attempt, which is again highly characteristic of his entire method of proof, he joins the economic crisis of 1873 with the alleged mistaken financial policy of the year 1891 and following. He claims that instead of obtaining great surplus earnings from the railways it should have been the object of the administration to reduce rates, to extend the system, to increase the number of cars, and especially to purchase larger cars. Here we meet all the well-known assertions which have occasionaly been made by a few of our magnates, from whose arsenal Mr. Meyer secured his weapons. Professor Meyer passes in silence over the proof brought forward time and time again in Parliament and elsewhere how greatly these charges have been exaggerated. Although otherwise apparently a diligent reader of the Archiv für Eisenbahnwesen, Professor Meyer has seen fit to utterly disregard the article published in the January number of the preceding year on the development of the freight tariffs of the Prussian-Hessian State railways, in which these very questions were treated with great thoroughness, supported by a wealth of illustrative material.

These in the main are the arguments by means of which Professor Meyer attempts to prove the premises set forth in the opening chapter of his book. They are directed less against the tariffs than the system of State railways as such. The author seems to occupy an entirely different viewpoint from ours, and it would be entirely superfluous were I in this place to take up with him the discussion of the question of the justification of the State railway system in Germany.

For a long time there has been no difference of opinion in Germany that a state railway system deserves the preference over private railway systems. Professor Meyer apparently can not realize that it is the duty of the state to administer the great monopolies of transportation as a unified system in accordance with the principle of the welfare of the great masses. The professor continually moves about in contradictions, declaring on one page that the state can make tariffs only with the yardstick and on the next criticising it for making certain exceptions. He also confuses his readers continually by rehearsing the difficulties which are encountered in adjusting certain tariffs in such a manner that they will be beneficial on the one hand and not injurious on the other, and then carefully omitting to tell how the state has succeeded in nearly every case cited by him in arriving at a satisfactory solution—to be sure, only after a very careful investigation of all the circumstances entering into the situation. And whether this method of procedure, which may sometimes be a little tedious, deserves the preference over the practice obtaining in America, according to which the great railways judge economic questions chiefly by their own subjective estimates and from the viewpoint of their own interests or that of favored shippers, is a matter with respect to which no German—and, I am convinced, also many American traffic men—are not in the least in doubt.

The American reader may possibly be impressed with the many source references and figures cited by Professor Meyer. One would think him, in consequence of this, uncommonly well read and an expert of a high order. But this appearance is deceiving. In the illustrations which have been given above I have been able to show how superficially Professor Meyer has done his reading. Here I may add a few further examples picked up at random. On pages 26 and 27 he states that the Society of German Railway Administrations is a union of officials of the various German state railways. Everybody knows that this society embraces all German, Austro-Hungarian, and several neighboring state railways, as well as private railways. On page 148 he asserts that Posen is a port situated on the Oder, near the Galician border. The statement, on page 358, that a Prussian minister, angered over certain transportation difficulties, had recently uttered the words "Commerce be hanged" is simply a fabrication of the author.

In closing this review I will take up the following example, which is especially characteristic of the method of work of this author. On page 158 Professor Meyer states:

"And within the city limits of Berlin one can count—and smell—upward of 14,000 cows, kept there to supply the population with milk that the railways are not allowed to bring from a distance."

The assertion is repeated in the following words, on page 387, after the author has described how the railways supply New York with milk and cream:

"And in the year of our Lord 1902 the firm of Von Bolle was stabling within the city of Berlin 14,000 milch cows, which supplied milk to 50,000 families. In addition there were in the suburbs of Berlin hundreds of dairies, each one stabling a considerable number of milch cows."

In the last citation the source from which Meyer claims to have taken his staement is given. It is the Zeitung des Vereins Deutscher Eisenbahnverwaltungen of the 29th of October, 1902. Now, let us see what that paper says:

"It is reported that the well-known dairy of Von Bolle, in Berlin, has a supply of 14,000 cows, which furnish daily about 85,000 liters of fresh milk to meet the demand of 50,000 households. Besides this, there are in the suburbs several hundred lare daries, which send their milk wagons into Berlin."

Up to this point Professor Meyer has copied with tolerable accuracy, aside from the fact that he states as a fact that which his reference merely states as a report. But his reference continues:

"But this is not nearly enough. Millions of liters of milk are brought in from the open country, some of it from a great distance, principally by the railways."

Then follows a detailed description of the facilities which the railways have provided for bringing in milk, such as low rates, fast trains, convenient train schedules, reductions for sending back empties, etc.; and from these facts the conclusion is drawn that in this manner the public as well as the railways receive their just dues. Yet all this Professor Meyer omits, although he certainly must have read this article. He would have his readers believe that all Berlin is dependent on the milk produced in Bolle's dairies. It is his purpose to give a very striking illustration of the backwardness of Prussian freight rates. Having this in mind, it does not suit his convenience that just in this matter the Prussian railways have performed splendid service; and since the evidence dose not support his line of argument he suppresses the facts which do not suit him.

As a matter of fact of the 250,000,000 liters of milk which were consumed in Berlin in the year 1902, 44,700,000 were produced in Berlin, 25,400,000 were brought into the city on wagons, and 180,000,000 were brought in by rail. (Statistical Yearbook of the city of Berlin, 1903, p. 314.) We are also enabled to state more exactly the figures representing the number of dairy cows than the source from which Professor Meyer quotes. According to a special census there were in 1902 in Berlin, Charlottenburg, Schoenberg, and Rixdorf together (not in Berlin alone) only 11,431, not 14,000 milk cows, which produced the above-mentioned 44,700,000 liters. The milk that came by rail originated at 216 stations, of which 198 are in the province of Bradenburg, 11 in the province of Saxony, etc. Further details Professor Meyer may read in the official statistics of the city of Berlin, Volume I, 1903. According to these statistics he has turned the facts upside down, deliberately, in order to cause hilarity among his readers, if he has read the article, or he read only the first sentence of his reference. In either case, this is a method of procedure which one has a right not to expect in a scientific book.

I can pass over more lightly the following chapters. The French tariffs are faulty, according to Professor Meyer, because they make energetic competition against the waterways impossible. He claims that it is the duty of the railways of Austria-Hungary and of the regions of the lower Danube to transport agricultural products of the east to Germany by means of low-graded mileage rates. These railways, like the Russian, especially the Siberian Railway, ought to follow the example of the American railways; then the agriculture of the Danubian provinces and Siberia would blossom forth like that of the great American west (p. 177). In this Meyer overlooks the fact that eastern Europe and the German Empire are not unified economic domain, and that European states will maintain, what is to him an entirely antiquated point of view, that the policy of customs duties and freight-rate policy shall not negative each other.

Professor Meyer, of course, maintains the direct contrary, when in another place (p. 340 ff) he considers it utterly false that the Interstate Commerce Commission does not regard railroad rates which render nugatory the Federal tariff legislation permissible. It is unnecessary for me to point out that a comparison of Siberia with the far west of the United States is ludicrous, except that I wish to use this as an example of Meyer's method. He claims that the Russian Government has impeded the development of the grain industry in Siberia by a faulty policy of its state tariffs. On page 178, he says: "Therefore it is worth while to recount what the Siberian peasant has been made to do under the incentive of gain in the single instance in which the railways were free to cooperate with men of enterprise and capital in the development of Siberia's resources." This he claims was the result of lower rates for the exportation of butter. Hence this same Siberian Railway is at one time an irrational state railway and at another an intelligently operated private railway. And the best part of it all is that it was just the Russian Government that has always promoted the dairy interests and the exportation of butter from Siberia in every way possible.

[The remainder of von der Leyen's review is devoted chiefly to Professor Meyer's comments on American conditions, closing with the following paragraph:]

I should regret it exceedingly if the very one-sided, and, so far as our railway conditions come into consideration, often absolutely untruthful representations of Meyer's book, should interfere with what seems to me a very wholesome movement on the part of the American Government with respect to railway policy, and possibly to thwart the strivings of the President of the Union.

APPENDIX 3.

RAILROAD COMMISSION OF WISCONSIN,
Madison, Wis., January 15, 1906.

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH,
Committee on Interstate Commerce,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have delayed answering your letter of December 16, 1905, requesting me to submit an opinion regarding Prof. Hugo. R. Meyer's book, entitled "Government regulation of railway rates; a study of the experience of the United States, France, Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Australia," in order that I might send you at the same time a critical review of the book by Dr. Alfred von der Leyen, who has long been known as one of the foremost students of transportation in the world and who has for many years occupied a high position in the Prussian Railway administration. I inclose a translation of this review, which was published in the January number of the Archiv für Eisenbahnwesen. Doctor von der Leyen's international reputation and his great practical experience, together with his scientific attainments, are ample guaranties of the correctness of the statements which he makes.

Before your letter was addressed to me I had been requested by a number of persons, whose opinion I esteem, to publish a review of Prof. Hugo R. Meyer's book for the reason that this book and the testimony of its author before the Senate committee had been given wide publicity and that the public should be informed as to the reliability of the book and testimony. I have never before consented to review a book of this kind, and a sense of public duty and regard for truth alone impel me to do so in this case. Substantially the following review will appear in the February number of the Journal of Political Economy, of the University of Chicago.

The book as a whole gives evidence of a great deal of hard work. The author has gone through much material in order to select what is included within the pages of the volume. It is written in an attractive, clear style, to which the author's convictions and feelings add vigor.

Perhaps it should be stated at the outset that the author of the book has never visited the European countries whose institutions he partially describes and at times assails so vehemently, as the following extracts from his testimony before the Senate committee will show:

"Senator CLAPP. May I ask whether you have made a personal examination of the conditions of Germany; and if so, how lately?

"Mr. MEYER. I am familiar with the situation down to the present day by means of the study of all of the official statistics published by the several governments and by means of a study of the parliamentary debates and by reading the reports of chambers of commerce and matters of that kind. The work itself has been done here, but I have used precisely the same material that I should have used had I gone to Germany.

"Senator CLAPP. Your statement will not rest upon what you have actually seen personally of the workings?

"Mr. MEYER. No, sir; if you mean by 'personally' that I have not seen the trains moving in Germany; but I have read the statements made in Parliament by the persons whom I should have been obliged to consult if I had wanted to make a personal investigation."

If he had ever made inquiries on the ground, the first half of his book would perhaps never have been written, or at least its pages would probably have reflected a more judicial spirit and a better temper.

In the first paragraph of the preface the author states that he began this study some twelve years ago, "with a strong bias in favor of state intervention in industry." "Bias" is a refractory medium against which Herbert Spencer and many others have warned people. A scientific student begins an inquiry not with bias, but with a free and untrammeled mind. He collects all available data and draws conclusions in the direction of the weight of evidence, and keeps his mind open for new evidence. The statements of facts of a student are given completely and without color or artifice, so that anyone who may interpret the given facts differently may draw different conclusions. Prof. Hugo R. Meyer began, as he says, with "a strong bias" in one direction. He ended with a stronger bias in the opposite direction. "Bias" is the unifying principle of his book.

The first 200 pages, comprising the smaller half of the book, are devoted to government regulation of railway rates in foreign countries, while the second half is devoted to the United States, with numerous allusions to foreign experience.

The author's general method of treatment is illustrated by what he says about the milk supply of the city of Berlin. On page 158 of his book he says:

"And within the city limits of Berlin one can count and smell upward of 14,000 cows, kept there to supply the population with milk that the railways are not allowed to bring from a distance."

On page 387 he says:

"In Germany they have no group rates on milk. And in the year of our Lord 1902 the firm of Van Bolle was stabling within the city of Berlin 14,000 milch cows, which supplied milk to 50,000 families. In addition there were in the suburbs of Berlin hundreds of dairies, each one stabling a considerable number of milch cows."

In his testimony before the Senate committee, May 5, 1905, he said: "Berlin is a city of upward of a million and a half of people, and one single dairy firm is stabling to-day within the very city limits of Berlin 41,000 cows; and there are hundreds of other dairy firms stabling within the limits of Berlin considerable numbers of cows. * * * The health of hundreds of thousands of people is endangered by the presence of these cows. The price of milk is kept at a materially higher price than it would be if they had refrigerator cars and the group-rate practice, and you could bring milk into Berlin from farms hundreds of miles away. The consumers of Berlin would be infinitely better off."

In substance, these statements were also contained in contributions to railway journals.

Now, what are the facts?

During the latter part of March, 1905, I visited Bolle's establishment in Berlin in order to satisfy myself that the pasturized milk which our son was getting was being properly prepared. I noticed no "smells" and saw not one of the 14,000 cows. (People who live in glass houses should throw no stones. Think of a citizen of Chicago preaching to Berlin on "smells" and danger to health!) A little over two months later my attention was called to Hugo R. Meyer's sensational testimony. Having been unable to pay a second visit to Bolle's establishment, I later addressed a series of questions to Mr. Bolle, referring to the Meyer testimony, which he kindly answered in writing, and from which I quote the following:

"1. At present I keep no cows in Berlin, but in a model dairy in Marienhain, near Coepenick, I maintain 150 cows.

"2. According to the last census, the total number of cows in Berlin and adjacent suburbs is 10,000 to 11,000.

"3. There exists no casual connection between the railway rates on milk and the number of cows maintained in Berlin.

"4. Berlin requires about 600,000 liters of milk daily, and of this amount approximately one-sixth is produced in Berlin (and suburbs)."

On page 387 of the book under review is a reference to the Zeitung des Vereins Deutscher Eisenbahnverwaltungen, which is given as authority for the statement regarding "Von" Bolle's dairy. The Zeitung referred to contains an article on the history of the development of the milk traffic. In the opening paragraph of the article the writer states in a casual way:

"In Berlin soll die bekannte Molkerei von Bolle einen Bestand von 14,000 Milchkühen haben * * *."

This is obviously not given as a statement of fact, but merely as a matter of report or hearsay, which our author's "bias" at once appropriated as a fact. It will also be observed that the "von" before the name Bolle is not a title. This great dairyman signs himself "C. Bolle." That our author should have made this ludicrous error regarding the use of the word "von," together with his misconstruction of the entire sentence, leads one to suspect that his knowledge of the German language is as open to criticism as his statements regarding German railways. But this is not all. The article in the Zeitung gives, among other things, a summary of the railway regulations governing the milk traffic. In the course of the discussion the writer describes the small beginnings of the milk traffic in shipments of single cans in baggage cars and its growth into shipments in milk cars and milk trains. He mentions a plan for shipping milk from Hanover to Berlin, a distance of 172 English miles. Men like Bolle favor an increase in the long distance milk traffic. Commenting upon these various matters, the writer in the Zeitung says that the requirements of the agricultural and dairy interests have been met in a most satisfactory manner, and that an experience of twenty years has met all demands reasonably well.

I would like to ask the author of the book under review whether due respect for fair play and truth should not have impelled him to give a hint of these things to his American readers, instead of garbling a single sentence from the article and offering it to Americans as a statement of fact when the writer of it expressly put it forward as a matter of report or hearsay, in a manner entirely incidental to the main purpose of the article, of which our author leaves his readers in complete ignorance. After the author of the book had published his essays on German railways in the Railway Age during 1903, I requested a competent Prussian traffic man to write a reply to the same. My German friend answered in substance, that in order to make the corrections to Prof. Hugo R. Meyer's essays intelligible to foreign (American) readers it would be necessary to draw a number of detailed maps of Germany and write a dozen volumes of description and fact. What I have found it necessary to say regarding the Bolle dairy certainly bears out this statement.

Suppose a German student were to send for American newspaper articles, speeches, and reports relating to the canal policy of the State of New York. Suppose he were to go through this material and cull all those expressions which give support to his "preconceived" theory that American railways have failed to meet the needs of commerce and trade; and, in order to touch the climax of his arguments, tell his German readers that the expenditure of over $120,000,000 on the part of New York State, approved by popular vote, is final and convincing proof of the absolute inefficiency, incompetency, and mismanagement of the New York Central and Hudson River Railway!

This is exactly what our author has done for American readers with respect to Prussian railways. He argues that because the German railways have not paralyzed or annihilated the waterways, as he says they have paralyzed German industry, they have been a failure. The down-trodden and long-suffering German manufacturer has been compelled to fall back upon canals and rivers in order to create competition for the railways which shall compel them to make rates under which commerce and industry can live. In almost the same breath we are told that the Germain Government has paralyzed the railways, that the railways have paralyzed industry, that there has been a "huge increase in the volume of the traffic" of the railways, and that the canals and waterways, not the railways, have created the modern industrial Germany which has won the admiration of all the world. Except the conflict of sectional interests, to which I shall call your attention presently, the competition of waterways for the salvation of industrial Germany is the most pivotal point in the book, and to this point the author returns again and again as the touchstone by means of which he can establish any particular bias.

What are the facts?

I desire to state in advance that I am by no means a supporter of the Prussian canal policy any more than I can approve the canal policy of New York. Artificial waterways present a very different problem than natural waterways. But I have no right to let my personal convictions and opinions on the matter of artificial inland waterways in general stand in the way of a truthful presentation, so far as I am able, of facts of German railway history. To attribute the revival of canal building in Prussia to the failure of the railways and to the necessity of creating competition for lowering rates is, in reality, to argue that the Prussian Government is creating a second monopoly in order that it may regulate the first.

The Prussian Government has a monopoly of towing (Schleppmonopol) on three canals, and motor boats can not be operated upon them without the permission of the Government. A strong movement is on foot to make all canals and improved streams Government monopoly. The thirty-first annual meeting of the Deutscher Handelstag, or trade parliament, representing 130 chambers of commerce, in February, 1905, adopted a series of resolutions relating to canals and streams, from which I select the following as indicative of the situation which has to be met in the Prussian state and German federal legislatures:

"1. The towing monopoly shall not be extended into a general monopoly of operation.

"2. The monopoly of the Government shall not be extended to other waterways.

"3. The monopolized waterways shall be kept open to private boats which provide their own motive power.

"4. The fees for towing shall not be higher than is necessary to cover fixed charges and provide for a sinking fund."

There is much more in the resolutions, but this is sufficient to illustrate one phase of the canal question in Prussia. The canal policy of Prussia proves absolutely nothing regarding governmental control of railway rates. So radical a paper as the Frankfurter Zeitung favors the Government monopoly of canals. The minister of public works has submitted statements showing, for instance, that the canal from Dortmund to the Rhine will cost much less than a fourth track on the present railway would cost. It is imperative that either should be done. Competent men hold that for certain kinds of traffic canals are cheaper than railways can ever hope to be. Others dispute this. The present Prussian canal projects probably rest more upon military considerations and the personal wishes of Germany's energetic Emperor than upon any other grounds.

The author is right when he criticises the political bargaining which characterized the parliamentary history of the late canal projects, but he errs when he attributes the canal movement to the alleged failure of the railways. In fact, if the author had really studied one of the references which he gives on page 109 (Schmoller's Jahrbuch, vol. 24, heft 3), he would have learned that what he ascribes in this instance to Prussian railway administration is only a part of the entire political system of the State which is attributable to the railway administration only in so far as this constitutes a part of the system of Prussian administration as a whole. One might as well attribute the recent cabinet changes in England to English railway management as to take the position the author does regarding Prussian railway policy. Prof. Gustav Schmoller is the author of one of the essays referred to on page 109. I would respectfully suggest that Prof. Hugo R. Meyer request Professor Schmoller to publish a few paragraphs stating his opinion regarding this part of the book under review. Furthermore, Prof. Hugo R. Meyer gives no specific reference in this, as in so many other instances, thus tending to convey the impression that eminent scholars like Schmoller support his views. The book abounds in such general references. On page 31, where Professor Meyer discusses opposition to the principle of what the traffic will bear, he refers to Ulrich, Staffeltarife and Wasserstrassen. This is a book of 234 pages, and the specific reference should have been given, for on page 76 Ulrich states that freight rates on waterways regard the value of goods much less than railway freight rates do; and on poge 138 Ulrich says that gains in traffic on artificial waterways are largely attributable to the unequal treatment by the state of railways and waterways, favoring the latter by not compelling them to earn interest on the investment. On page 67 the author refers to an essay of 247 pages, without indicating the exact place. On page 7 he gives a general reference to a review of a book on the "Statistical description of the city of Frankfurt on the Main."

I have by no means tested all his references, but I have found so much unreliability in those which I have examined that I am convinced that the book is untrustworthy also in this respect. The author attributes the concentration of the population in Germany to the mismanagement of railway traffic, but the comparative statistics of urban and rural population of the United States and Prussia show proportionately a greater percentage of increase in the urban population of the United States than Prussia during the railway era. We should be justified in ridiculing anyone who would venture to explain the growth of urban population solely by bad railway management, but that is what the author has suggested for Prussia. He seems to regard it good logic to consider mere coincidence as casual relations and to explain complex phenomena by a single cause, namely, government rate making.

In the opinion of Prof. Hugo R. Meyer, the conflict of sectional interests continually results in deadlocks which prevent changes and reductions in rates. Such a conflict of interests exists in Prussia. It exists also in the United States. In Prussia all these conflicts take place in the full light of publicity. The proceedings of councils and committees and legislature reveal every phase of every railway rate question which is brought forward. A decision is finally made, and the defeated party or interest feels dissatisfied and complains. By accumulating utterances of the discontented for a quarter century back, the author has constructed his indictment of the Prussian system. He has exaggerated the idea of conflict, and omitted a proper presentation of the many published proceedings which show nothing but earnest discussions aiming at the truth in the matter and a rational decision. If we had proceedings of this kind in the United States, we should be able to read of the same conflict of interests, only sometimes greater and more severe; the same discontent and complaints, as well as many others which have long been forgotten in Prussia or which have never existed there.

In Prussia every interest, no matter how small, has an opportunity of being heard publicly on every railway question which affects it, and the decision is made public and known to all. In the United States only the strong and importunate ones are sure of consideration; there are no public deliberations; there is no public decision. Little or nothing may become known to those who would profit by such knowledge. The author makes much of political rate making and politics in the Prussian railways. In a large way politics do enter transportation questions, especially with reference to export and import trade. Germany has a protective tariff, and railway rates are adjusted in harmony with the tariff policy of the state. The tariff laws of the United States are negatived every week when railways carry imported articles from seaports to inland cities at a fraction of what they will carry the same domestic product for. Men differ on the tariff policy. But if a tariff law stands on the books, who can justify its violation through the instrumentality of a through rate from a foreign point of origin to a domestic point of destination? The author criticises the Prussian railway administration for making rates in harmony with the export and import policy of the country. This is the only sane policy, and it requires no extended arguments to prove it. A tariff law, like every other law, should either be obeyed or repealed, and not circumvented. But in the invidious American sense of the word, the Prussian railways are most emphatically not in politics. There are no paid lobbyists, no subsidized newspapers, no partisan publication bureaus, no "rake offs." I have been able to discover only one instance of dishonesty and faithlessness, and that was a case of a subordinate employee who had appropriated railway scrap to his own uses. The case was tried only a few months ago. The man was sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of five years. Who will venture to say what would happen if the books of the American railway companies were to be subjected to the tests of the Prussian, with the same consequences in the courts? In all the testimony taken before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce I do not remember having seen a single statement something like this:

Question. Mr. ——— ———, does your road discriminate?

Answer. No. sir.

Question. Mr. ——— ———, do you pay rebates?

Answer. No. And I wish to say to you, Senators, that if you desire to convince yourselves of the truth of my statements I cordially invite you to appoint expert accountants to investigate the books of my company.

With all due respect to our railway officials, I can not help wondering why it is that not one of the many witnesses ever thought of making this suggestion in order to set at rest this vexing question. There is still time to volunteer before Congress gets through with the consideration of railway legislation.

One of the most astonishing chapters in the book is that relating to railway revenue and technical efficiency. The author pronounces the verdict of technical inefficiency on the Prussian railways, and the only proof which he offers is the use of small freight cars, small trainloads, and that the railways have not killed off the waterways. Prussian officials are incessantly in search of improvements. They send experts into all parts of the world for new ideas. I had supposed that, all in all, the Prussian railways represented the very height of technical advancement, and I have never heard a word to the contrary from anyone who has actually made an investigation.

The author might have considered the safety of Prussian railway traffic and the block system, the splendidly constructed and maintained railway stations in large and small places, the systematic and orderly arrangement of every branch of the service, the regularity of trains, the frequency of passenger traffic, the splendid financial results of operation and a hundred other things. Not counting the millions which the Prussian railways have paid in taxes to subordinate political units, averaging during the last five years almost exactly 13,000,000 marks, or about $3,250,000, annually, they have paid into the State treasury more than enough to pay off every cent of railway indebtedness, including interest, leaving the great system of about 20,000 miles with all equipment as a net asset in the hands of the State. This, too, in spite of the fact that many unprofitable branch lines have been constructed which private capital probably never would have attempted, and that no account has been taken in this estimate of the interest on the aggregate of $1,000,000,000, which has been taken out of net earnings year by year for general State expenses since 1882. The production of such vast surplus earnings has given rise to criticisms about the level of rates, the critics maintaining that the entire surplus should go to trade and industry in the form of reduced rates, while the supporters of the administration hold that the original promises when the State acquired the roads did not imply that all these benefits should flow to commerce, but simply that rates should be reduced and that industry should be well served.

Important reductions have been made, as is shown by tables published in the Archiv für Eisenbahnwesen, January-February number, 1905, pages 96 to 100; but still greater reductions could be made, so far as the financial ability of the railways is concerned. The net surplus from operation, according to the budget for the present year (1905), after all expenses and interest charges have been paid, including new equipment, construction, special funds, etc., is about $120,000,000. A reduction in rates amounting to $120,000,000 would indeed make itself felt! But the Prussian State, like all modern states, is a unit; and the practical question is, Considering the concrete conditions under which this state exists, shall we raise $120,000,000 by means of a higher rate of taxation, or shall we raise it through the medium of the railway rate? This is the fundamental question which the author does not bring into the horizon of the book. The matter of the size of the cars and trainloads is one that affects all Europe. It has been discussed with much zeal on both sides in England. The author does not say that the English railways are technically inefficient because they use small cars. He says absolutely nothing about England, although from the point of view of government control English experience is especially valuable to the United States. During the early part of 1903 calculations were made which showed that the freight carried in 458 ordinary London and Northwestern freight cars could have been hauled in 322 30-ton American cars, but that the tare weight in the latter instance would have been 4,669 tons as compared with 2,199 tons in the former. I do not know whether these figures are unassailable.

English and Prussian railway administrations are introducing larger cars as fast as they think it feasible, but mere "bigness" does not turn their heads. I express no opinion upon the subject. I am satisfied to leave that to the operating experts, but I believe that American readers should know that English railway officials, like those of Prussia, are not at all agreed upon the size of freight cars, and that these officials dwell upon their short distances and the retail nature of their traffic as compared with the great distances and the wholesale nature of the traffic in the United States.

In his annual message for 1904 President Roosevelt said:

"I am of the opinion that at present it would be undesirable, if it were not impracticable, finally to clothe the Commission with general authority to fix railroad rates."

Every citizen of the United States knows, or ought to know, how the President stands on the Commission question. Suppose the above sentence were to be quoted in a German book to convince readers in Germany that President Roosevelt was opposed to the regulation of rates through commissions. Quotations from Bismarck, Miquel, Thielen, and others can be used in the same way. Jencke is an ardent supporter of state railways, but as the representative of a great primitive interest he has uttered complaints. These our author seems to have discovered.

I wish to say a few words regarding the opponents of the Prussian railway system in Germany. In the sense in which the author represents the opposition, I could find none of consequence in Berlin, and I inquired diligently among all classes of people. I had interviews with the only parliamentary leaders who, as far as I could learn, ever express serious criticisms; also with the editor of Die Nation, quoted by the author, and who has criticised the railway administration; members of the chamber of commerce; several great merchants, and others. To repeat all that these men said to me would require a series of articles. Among other things, I asked of each of them this direct question:

"Is there anything of consequence in the railway experience of Prussia which could be construed as an argument against effective control of railway rates in the United States?"

Everyone of them answered with an emphatic "No." When I told one of them that the utterances of parliamentary leaders like himself were being used in the United States to influence public opinion against President Roosevelt's railway policy, he pronounced such attempts as dishonest and insane. With much feeling he said that in the light of the experiences of the past no man of sense could to-day advocate a purely individualistic policy in dealing with the railways, and that the only question which could be rationally discussed was that of "strictest governmental control of rates or state ownership." He believes in the former. Nearly all Germans hold to the contrary. I have always opposed government ownership for the United States for reasons which I can not advance here. But I have always felt, too, that this was no reason why I should refuse to recognize the merits of the Prussian system. It is not necessary to prove state-owned railways of other countries a failure in order to demonstrate the present impracticability and undesirability of government ownership of railways in the United States.

Our author stands upon the let-alone platform of Adam Smith, apparently unmindful of the fact that the world of to-day is very different from that which caused Adam Smith to formulate his individualistic doctrines. It is no longer open to debate that new conditions require new laws. At the recent meeting of the American Economic Association at Baltimore Prof. Hugo Meyer declared that originally he started out to "preach socialism," but that he became thoroughly converted to the doctrine of laissez faire. The partisanship and misrepresentations of his book are likely to do more for the spread of socialism than any direct efforts of his to preach socialism would have done.

The brief chapter on France has all the characteristics of the discussion of German conditions. Here, as elsewhere, there is wanting a fairly adequate presentation of the French system of control as it actually exists. Here, as in most parts of the book, the references are very general or entirely wanting. The author quotes, for instance, Colson's Transports et Tarifs a number of times without specifying the page. Colson is good authority. This one of Colson's volumes contains nearly 700 pages. Colson is diametrically opposed to the author in his views regarding Government control in France; yet he is apparently quoted as siding with the author. The author might have referred to pages 348, 350, 363, 366, 666, and scores of other places in Transports et Tarifs, where views very different from those of the author are expressed. In one place (p. 363) Colson comments upon the power of the French Government to approve or disapprove rates made by the companies. This arrangement he characterizes as a "very happy" one.

Every student of transportation knows Richard von Kaufmann's 2-volume work, of over 800 pages each, on French railways. Von Kaufmann has made the study of French railways practically his life work. He spent years in going through the documents and in conferring with all classes of people with reference to the subject of his inquiry. In the concluding pages of his work he gives a most appreciative summary of French experience. (Vol. II, German edition, 563, 693, 824–831.) In extended conversation with von Kaufmann he amply demonstrated to me his conviction regarding the general success of the French railways from every point of view, and he emphatically repudiated the allegations of Prof. Hugo R. Meyer. He was unqualified in his approval of strict Government control of railway rates in the United States, the wisdom of which policy, in his estimation, the experience of France conclusively demonstrated.

Among the other countries treated in the book under review, the discussion relating to Australia appears to me to come nearest the mark; but, in the light of other things the author has said, I prefer to suspend judgment regarding Australian railways until I can learn more from some one who has studied them "without a strong bias."

Russian railways have been constructed and managed almost exclusively from a military point of view. They have been rich in deficits. But most people will be surprised to learn that Government rate making in Russia has not only paralyzed the Siberian railway, but also created the unfortunate conditions prevailing in that country (pp. 179–180, 186, 452). "Had the Roumanian farmer in 1902 been served by modern railways the wheat which he raised would have brought him upward of 7 per cent to 14 per cent more than it in fact brought him" (p. 146). I would like to ask if, when Columbus discovered America, the American Indians had been served by transcontinental railways, what would the price of Indian corn, potatoes, and wampum have been, and what would have happened to Columbus? If every Dakota farmer had a locomotive and a steamship, how much more would Dakota wheat lands be worth?

The author reaches his highest level in the first four chapters of the second part of the book, which is devoted to the United States. He has thorough control of his selected facts, and stands commanding in the arena like a masterful controversialist.

If one could eliminate from the chapters on The Workings of Competition and The Adjustment of Railway Rates, the author's aspersions regarding the Interstate Commerce Commission and his partisan flings at the railways of Germany and government control of rates in general, I should unhesitatingly say that these chapters represented the best account of the influence of sectional or territorial interests on railway rates which has yet been written. The great work which American railways have accomplished in developing our resources is fully acknowledged. The abuses which have crept into the business, many of which still persist, the author regards, as a rule, as mere "pains of progress." It being assumed that railway practices have been generally beneficent, the question of how many of these pains were really inseparable from progress is not seriously discussed. For instance, in only one place (p. 301) is there the slightest intimation that there can be anything wrong connected with the basing point system. I have heard quite a few railway men say that they were not at all enthusiastic about the system of percentage grouping (p. 290).

What the author says about this system is excellent, but if he had included some statements from people who believe that they have not been located in the correct group, the reader of the book would get something to which he is fairly entitled before making up his mind with respect to the merits of the system. The reliance of the author upon competition is something inspiring in these days, when eighteenth century theories rarely appear in living form. No railway world could be better, he seems to think, than that which has been developed in the United States under the competitive régime, free from the shackles which the Interstate Commerce Commission would have enjoyed putting on the roads. The Supreme Court of the United States is cited many times for the purpose of showing that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been in error. The author has scarcely a redeeming word for this Commission. No one would suspect from what the author says that the Interstate Commerce Commission has ever uttered one word regarding what were, in its estimation, undesirable effects of certain decisions of the Supreme Court.

Now, the Interstate Commerce Commission may have been all wrong in what it has thus said, but it would seem that the reader should know that such ideas had sometime been expressed by the Commission. I know of no student of transportation who does not regard the application to railways of the Sherman antitrust law, the trans-Missouri, the joint-traffic, and a number of other decisions of the Supreme Court as matters of grave concern. But the mention of such things is unnecessary when it is the purpose of an author to show how foolishly the Interstate Commerce Commission has always decided. It is alleged that the inevitable rule of railway commissions is a distance tariff, but there is in this book no authoritative statement of such tariffs in the thirty-odd States in which commissions exist; nor a word regarding the distance tariffs which railway companies apply. The Interstate Commerce Commission has distinctly not committed itself to a distance tariff, although persons familiar with traffic matters believe that distance has often been too much disregarded. In fact, the author seems to assume that the rates prescribed by commissions are always the very worst conceivable, while rates made by railway officials are uniformly the very best possible.

The unrestricted activity of railway officials in controlling the transportation of this country is, in the estimation of our author, the best guaranty of progress, because these men, the author believes, are the most reliable interpreters of "the established law of our country and the genius of our institutions." It is my pleasure to know several of the greatest railway men in the country. I yield to no man in my admiration for the great work which they have done; but, as a free citizen, I am unwilling to place the destiny of my own life, of my community, and of my State in their hands without reserving the right to have their mandates modified, and, if necessary, tested before an impartial tribunal with power to act promptly.

I have devoted so much space in the first part of my letter to foreign railways that it is necessary to be this brief on what the author says regarding the United States. I wish, however, to add another word. Suppose all the allegations regarding the stupidity and mechanical action of foreign governmental authorities having in charge the regulation of railway rates, as depicted by the author, were true, what has that to do with the real question before the American people, which is the protection of those interests which now suffer as a result of arrangements and practices connected with railway transportation? The people of the United States have a railway problem of their own, which they must solve in their own way, under conditions which prevail in this country, and no discussion of foreign questions, valuable as it may be, should permit us to have our own problems obscured.

Shall we be content to leave the adjustment of hundreds of thousands of transactions to the one-sided methods of purely private action? I care not how conscientious and diligent a traffic manager and his assistants may be, they are bound to make mistakes, and many of them; and those who suffer in consequence have not always the power or opportunity to secure a recognition of their just rights. An impartial, competent commission, clothed with adequate powers, is exactly what is needed to meet such contingencies. The author's let-alone policy has long been discredited. Governmental regulation of railway rates is the only alternative to government ownership, which is still open for discussion. I am in favor of the first alternative.

In conclusion, I wish to say again that I undertook this review reluctantly. It has not been pleasant for me to say some of the things which, in the interest of fair play and truth, I felt it was my duty to say. It was distressing to observe how often a splendid page or chapter of the book lost much of its value because of the apparent partisanship of the author. On the whole it is not much of an exaggeration to say that Prof. Hugo R. Meyer's book bears the same relation to a scientific study of transportation that Coin's Financial School bears to a scientific study of money and banking.

Hoping that these remarks may be of service, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

B. H. MEYER.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to be able to state, as other Members have, that in the action of our committee we have all joined in the recommendation of this bill. It contains so many things with which all are satisfied that all of the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee join in the determination to support this bill without alteration or amendment. Democrats and Republicans concur in this.

For many years the railroads of America have been administered as though they were private property owned by the railroad corporations. They have charged what tolls they pleased; favored one community and injured another—in fact, have forgotten at times and disregarded their duties as the trustees of a public trust. In this connection it becomes important for us to consider what is the legal status of the American railroad. Upon this subject there is no lack of authority.

At the last session of Congress I was able, in the brief time allotted me, to say a very few of the things that I wished to say upon the subject of rate legislation. In the little, however, that I did say I was criticised and taken to task by my distinguished colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] for repeating several times the declaration that "the American railroads were in no sense private property; they were built by the public, and that those controlling them are public trustees, owing a duty to the public." The distinguished gentleman expressed surprise, calling this doctrine "something new; something good that nobody knew before." I deny that it is novel or new. Upon the other hand, it is as old as our railroads are—recognized and declared by every court that has ever spoken upon the subject.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in the case of the Erie and Northeast Railroad Company v. Casey, reported in 26 Pennsylvania State Reports, at page 287, held "that a railroad built by the authority of the State for purposes of commerce is a public highway and in no sense private property, and that a corporation authorized to build and operate it is a servant of the State as much as any other legally appointed officer appointed to perform any other public duty." There was not one dissenting opinion in the court upon this proposition, and this was no mere dicta, but a decision involving millions of dollars' worth of property. The charter of the Erie and Northeast Railroad Company had by the legislature of Pennsylvania been repealed for the abuse of privileges, and in the same act the governor was directed to appoint one or more persons to take and have the custody of said railroad for the use of the State. And the question was made whether the State could take the road constitutionally without first making compensation in money. This contention was upon the theory that the railroad was the private property of the corporation which had furnished money to build it under its franchise granted by the State.

I wish to quote briefly from this opinion. The court said:

> The authority given by the act of October, 1855, to the defendant to take possession of the railroad is asserted by the plaintiff's counsel to be an act of confiscation—a taking of private property for public use without compensation. If this be true, the injunction ought to be awarded; for no legislature can do such a thing under our constitution. When a corporation is dissolved by a repeal of its charter the legislature may appoint or authorize the governor to appoint a person to take charge of its assets for the use of creditors and stockholders; and this is not confiscation any more than it is confiscation to appoint an administrator to a dead man or a committee for a lunatic. But money or goods or lands which are or were the private property of a defunct corporation can not be arbitrarily seized for the use of the State without compensation paid or provided for. This act, however, takes nothing but the road. Is that private property? Certainly not. It is a public highway, solemnly devoted by law to the public use.
> When the lands were taken to build it on they were taken for public use; otherwise they could not have been taken at all. It is true the plaintiffs had a right to take tolls from all who traveled or carried freight on it, according to certain rules fixed in their charter, but that was a mere franchise, a privilege derived entirely from the charter, and it was gone when the charter was repealed. The State may grant to a corporation, or to an individual, the franchise of taking tolls on any highway opened or to be opened whether it be a railroad or river, canal or bridge, turnpike or common road. When the franchise ceases by its own limitation, by forfeiture or by repeal, the highway is thrown back on the hands of the State, and it becomes her duty, as the sovereign guardian of the public rights and interests, to take care of it. She may renew the franchise, give it to some other person, exercise it herself, or declare the highway open and free to all the people. If the railway itself was the private property of the stockholders, then it remains theirs and they may use it without a charter as other people use their own—run it on their own account, charge what tolls they please, close it or open it when they think proper—disregard every interest except their own. The repeal of charters on such terms would be courted by every railroad company in the State, for it would have no effect but to emancipate them from the control of law, convert their limited privileges into a broad, unbounded license. On this principle a corporation might be rewarded, but never punished for misconduct. Repeal of its charter, instead of bringing it to a shameful end, would put "length of days in its right hand and in its left hand riches and honor." But it is not so. Railroads made by the authority of the Commonwealth upon lands taken under the right of eminent domain, and established by her laws as thoroughfares for the commerce that passes through her borders, are her highways. No corporation has any property in them, though corporations may have franchises annexed to and exercisable within them. Such a franchise the plaintiffs had, but they have it no longer. The right to take tolls on a road is an incorporeal hereditament, which may be granted to a corporation or to an individual, and the grantee has an estate in the franchise. The estate endures forever if the charter be perpetual; for years if it be given for a limited period, and at will if it be repealable at the pleasure of the legislature. This corporation, after its privileges are abused, had an estate at will, and the Commonwealth chose to demand repossession. That terminated the estate as completely as an estate for years would be terminated after the expiration of the term. The grant was exhausted; the corporation lived its time out. Its lease of life was expressly limited at the day of its creation to a period when the legislature should dissolve it for its conduct. When the legislative will was spoken, its hour had come.

In the court's brief summary of its decision the eighth and ninth findings are as follows:

> VIII. The charter being constitutionally repealed, the franchises are, as a necessary consequence, resumed to the State, and the road remains what it always was—public property.
> IX. The corporators can not be entitled to compensation, for they had no property in the road, and after their default they held the corporate franchises at the will of the legislature, and the exertion of that will, in the resumption of franchises, did them no injury but what they agreed to submit to. The injunction which the plaintiffs have moved for is to be refused.

It will be noted that this case involved a question not only of the constitutionality of the act under the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, but of its constitutionality under the Federal Constitution. The case therefore could have been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States upon that question, but the decision was sustained by such clear reason and such abundant authority that it was acquiesced in by the stockholders of the corporation, notwithstanding the fact that it deprived them of the possession of an immensely valuable railroad.

The decision thus laid down by this court, as far as I know, has never once been criticised, nor in all the numberless cases involving this question has there been a single voice raised challenging this doctrine. "Something new, something good, something that nobody knew about before," indeed. There is not a single railroad in America—and I challenge the distinguished gentleman from Ohio to name one—that has not affirmatively invoked this principle in its own behalf in lawsuits and won judgments in its own favor that were predicated upon nothing else. In every appropriation case that is brought against the citizen the first issue litigated is whether or not there is a public necessity for the taking of his land and whether or not the railroad corporation represents that public necessity. That being found affirmatively, the citizen's land is taken from the category of private property, his every right is divested therein, and the land is returned again to the great public domain and placed in the custody and control of the public's agent and servant—the railroad company.

It is universally recognized by good lawyers ever since the decision of the celebrated Dartmouth College case that when a corporation accepts from the public a charter there is established between the public and the corporation accepting and acting under the charter, spending money thereon, a contract.

The corporators of a railroad company on their part bind themselves to build for the State a railroad to be used by the people as a public highway. The railroad is to be built between certain designated termini. In consideration thereof the State consents to clothe the shareholders with a portion of her own sovereignty; to erect them into a body politic; to delegate to them her right of eminent domain, and to grant them the franchise of taking reasonable tolls from all who should travel or carry on her highway.

It will be perceived that under this status thus judicially defined every railroad company is a public trustee. It is an official part of the government, and ought to be held to as strict an accountability as any other department of our public service.

The charter of a railroad corporation, when accepted and moneys are spent in accordance therewith, becomes a contract and rights vest thereunder, and it becomes important to inquire what those rights are. It has been judicially determined that the right to charge toll over the railroads of the country is limited to such charges as are reasonable. This principle has been recognized by every State legislature in the fixing of maximum rates. Then the railroads of the country, it will be seen, have a vested right so long as their franchises endure to collect reasonable tolls. The power has been delegated to them to levy a tax upon all interstate commerce passing over their road, provided that levy be always reasonable. Beyond this they have no right to go. Thus far their right is absolute—surrounded by all the guaranties of the Constitution protecting private property and vested rights under contracts.

While, therefore, railroads perform their duty strictly there is not the slightest power in the legislative arm to touch them, but if they go beyond the limits of their rightful authority and levy an unreasonable and excessive toll, or oppress one business to help another, make unreasonable exactions upon one set of shippers to "wickedly give the money in rebates to another more favored, they should be promptly driven back under the lash of the law."

A right understanding of the legal status of the railroad companies of America I deem so important to the working out and correct solution of this legislation that is sought in this regard that I shall take occasion to print in the RECORD and make a part of my argument extracts from the speech made by Judge Jeremiah S. Black before the legislature of Pennsylvania in the year 1883. That argument has never been answered. It is unanswerable. And I trust that I, in this way, may make those dead lips vocal again and bring their wondrous message to the ears of another generation, if happily it may hear and heed its warning.

SPEECH DELIVERED BY JEREMIAH S. BLACK BEFORE THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE PENNSYLVANIA SENATE AT THE SESSION OF 1883.

The irrepressible conflict between the rights of the people and the interests of railroad corporations does not seem likely to terminate immediately. I beg your permission to put our case on your record somewhat more distinctly than heretofore.

Why do I give myself this trouble? My great and good friend, the president of the Reading Railroad Company, expresses the suspicion that I am quietly acting in the interest of some anonymous corporation. I wish to contradict that as flatly as I can.

The charge that I am communist enough to wish the destruction of all corporate property is equally untrue. I think myself the most conservative of citizens. I believe with my whole heart in the rights of life, liberty, and property, and if anybody has struggled more faithfully, through good report and evil, to maintain them inviolate I do not know who he is. I respect the State constitution. Perhaps I am prejudiced in favor of natural justice and equality. I am convinced that without the enforcement of the fundamental law honest government can not be expected.

These considerations, together with the request of many friends, would be sufficient reason for doing all the little I can to get "appropriate legislation." At all events, it is unfair to charge me with any motive of lucre or malice.

It is not proposed by those who think as I do that any corporation shall lose one atom of its property. A lawful contract between a railroad company and the State is inviolable and must not be touched by hostile hands however bad the bargain may have been for the people. Mr. Gowen and all others with similar contracts on their hands are entitled each to his pound of flesh, and if it be "so nominated in the bond" the Commonwealth must bare her bosom to all their knives, and let them "cut nearest the heart."

But we, the people, have rights of property as well as the corporations, and ours are—or ought to be—as sacred as theirs. Between the great domain which we have ceded to them and that which still belongs to us the line is plainly and distinctly marked, and if they cross it for purposes of plunder they should be driven back under the lash of the law. It is not the intent of the amended Constitution nor the desire of those who demand its enforcement to do them the slightest injury. We only ask for that impartial and just protection which the State as parens patriæ owes to us not less than to them.

In the first place, it will, I think, be admitted by all impartial persons of average intelligence that the companies are not the owners of the railroads. The notion that they are is as silly as it is pernicious. It is the duty of every commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural State to open thoroughfares of trade and travel through her territory. For that purpose she may take the property of citizens and pay for the work out of her own treasury. When it is done she may make it free to all comers or she may reimburse the cost by levying a special tax upon those who use it; or she may get the road built and opened by a corporation or an individual and pay for it by permitting the builder to collect tolls or taxes from those who carry and travel on it. Pennsylvania has tried all these methods with her turnpikes, canals, and railroads. Some have been made at her own cost and thrown open; on others, made by herself, she placed officers to collect a special tax; others have been built for her by contract in which some natural or artificial person agreed to do the work for the privilege of appropriating the taxes which she authorized to be levied.

But in all these cases the proprietary right remained in the State and was held by her in trust for the use of the people. Those who run the railroads and canals are always public agents. It is impossible to look at them in any other light or to conceive how a different relation could exist, because a railroad which is not managed by public agents can not be a public highway. The character of their appointment, even upon the same work, has differed materially. The Columbia Railroad and all the canals were for a time under the management of officers appointed by the governor, or elected by the people, and paid out of the State treasury. Afterwards the duty was devolved by the State upon the persons associated together under acts of incorporation, who contracted to perform it upon certain terms. The Erie and Northeast Railroad was at first run for the State by a company; the company was removed from its trust for misbehavior; the governor then took it and appointed an officer to superintend the work; later the governor's appointee was displaced, with the consent of the legislature, and the duty was again confided to a corporation newly chartered.

None of these agents—neither the canal commissioner nor the State receiver, nor any corporation that went before or came after—had the slightest proprietary right or title to the railroads themselves. To say that they had would be as preposterous as to assert that township roads are the private property of the supervisors.

The legal relations existing between the State and the persons whom she authorizes to supervise her highways were somewhat elaborately discussed by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of the Erie and Northeast Railroad Company v. Casey. (2 Casey, pp. 307–324.) It was there determined that a railroad built by authority of the State for the general purposes of commerce is a public highway and in no sense private property; that a corporation authorized to run it is a servant of the State as much as an officer legally appointed to do any other public duty; as strictly confined by the laws and as liable to be removed for transgressing them.

All the judges concurred in this opinion. The two who dissented from the judgment do so on the technical ground that certain circumstances, which would have estopped the State in a judicial proceeding, disarmed the legislature of the power to repeal. Neither they nor any other judge in the country whose authority is worth a straw ever denied the doctrine for which I have here cited that case, though it may have been sometimes overlooked, ignored, or perhaps evaded. This principle and no other was the basis of the decision in Pennsylvania and all the other States that cities and counties might issue bonds, or their money, and tax their people to aid in building railways. The Supreme Court of the United States has affirmed it in scores of cases. It was so universally acknowledged that the convention of 1873 incorporated it into the constitution as a part of the fundamental law. I do not know upon what foundation more solid than this any great principle of jurisprudence was ever established in a free country. When in addition you consider the reason of the thing, and the supreme necessity of it for the purposes of common justice, it seems like a sin, a shame, a scandal to oppose it.

It being settled that the railroads and canals belong of right to the State for the use of the people, and that the corporations who have them in charge are mere agents to run them for the owners, it will surely not be denied that all proper regulations should be made to prevent those agents from betraying their trust. The wisdom is very plain of those provisions in our constitution which put them on a level with other public servants and forbid them to prostitute their functions for purposes merely mercenary or to engage in any business which necessarily brings their private interests into conflict with their public duty. Seeing the vast magnitude of the affairs intrusted to them, and the terrible temptation to which their cupidity is exposed, it is certainly necessary that you should hold them to their responsibilities and hold them hard.

But, on the other hand, the corporations deny that they owe any responsibility to the State more than individuals engaged in private business. They assert that the management of the railroads, being a mere speculation of their own, these thoroughfares of trade and travel must be run for their interests, without regard to public right. If they take advantage of their power to oppress the labor and overtax the land of the State; if they crush the industry of one man or place to build up the prosperity of another; if they plunder the rich by extortion, or deepen the distress of the poor by discriminating against them, they justify themselves by showing that all this was in the way of business; that their interest required them to do it; that if they had done otherwise their fortunes would not have been so great as they are; that it was the prudent, proper, and successful method of managing their own affairs. This is their universal answer to all complaints. Their protests against legislative intervention to protect the public always takes this shape, and with more or less distinctness of outline. In whatever language they clothe their argument it is the same in substance as that with which Demetrius, the silversmith, defended the sanctity of the temple for which he made shrines: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth."

That railroad corporations and their paid adherents should take this view of the subject is perhaps not surprising, nor does it excite our special wonder to see them supported by the subsidiary rings whom they patronize; but it is surprising to find that this odious and demoralizing theory has made a strong lodgment in the minds of disinterested, upright, and high-placed men. Two members of the Senate judiciary—I do not say they are the ablest, because comparisons are odious, but they are both of them among the foremost men of the country for talents and integrity—these gentlemen emphatically dissented from me when I asserted that the management of the railroads was not a matter of business to be conducted like a private enterprise merely for the profit of the directors and stockholders. A heresy so supported is entitled to serious refutation, however absurd it may seem on its face.

I aver that a man or corporation appointed to do a public duty must perform it with an eye single to the public interest. If he perverts his authority to purposes of private gain he is guilty of corruption, and all who aid and abet him are his accomplices in crime. He defiles himself if he mingles his own business with that intrusted to him by the Government and uses one to promote the other. If a judge excuse himself for a false decision by saying that he sold his judgment for the highest price he could get, you cover his character with infamy. A ministerial officer, like a sheriff, for instance, who extorts from a defendant, or even from a convict in his custody, what the law does not allow him to collect, and puts the surplus in his pocket, is a knave upon whom you have no mercy. You send county commissioners to the penitentiary for consulting their own financial advantage to the injury of the general welfare. When the officers of a city corporation make a business of running it to enrich themselves, at the expense of the public, you can see at a glance that they are the basest of criminals. Why, then, can you not see that the officers of a railway corporation are equally guilty when they pervert the authority with which they are clothed to purposes purely selfish? A railroad corporation is a part of the civil government as much as a city corporation. The officers of the former, as much as the latter, are agents and trustees of the public, and the public has an interest precisely similar in the fidelity of both. Why, then, should partiality or extortion be condemned as criminal in one if it be tolerated as fair business when practiced by the other? Yet there are virtuous and distinguished statesmen among us who think that faithful service ought not to be enforced against the railroad companies, however loudly it may be claimed by the body of the people as their just due, and no matter how distinctly it may be commanded by the constitution itself.

I am able to maintain that all the corruption and misgovernment with which the earth is cursed grows out of this fatal proclivity of public servants to make a business of their duty. Recall the worst cases that have occurred in our history and see if every one of them does not finally resolve itself into that. Tweed and his associates, the Philadelphia rings, the carpetbag thieves, the star-route conspirators all went into business for themselves while pretending to be engaged in the public service. Oakes Ames distributed the stock of the Crédit Mobilier where he thought it would "do the most good" to himself and others with whom he was connected, and that was the business in him who gave and in them that took his bribes. Madison Wells, when he proposed to Mr. Kenner that he would make a true return of the election if he could be assured of getting "$200,000 apiece for himself and Jim Anderson and a less sum for the niggers," had as keen an eye to business as if he had been president of a railroad company instead of a returning board. Certain greedy adventurers made it a business to rob the nation of its lands, and, uniting with Congress, carried it on so magnificently that they got away with an area nearly equal to nine States as large as Pennsylvania. The imposition of the whisky tax, excluding what was held on speculation, was business to the officers and legislators who were sharp enough to anticipate their own votes. You will see, on reflection, that every base combination which officers have made with one another or with outside parties has been a business arrangement, precisely like that which the railroads justify on the sole ground that it is business. The effect is not only to corrupt those who engage in such transactions, but to demoralize all who are tempted by personal and party attachments to apologize for it.

* * * * * * *

The functions of railroad corporations are clearly defined, and ought to be as universally understood as those of any servant which the State or General Government employs. Without proprietary right in the highways, they are appointed to superintend them for the owners. They are charged with the duty of seeing that every needed facility for the use of those thoroughfares shall be furnished to all citizens, like the justice promised in Magna Charta, without sale, denial, or delay. Such services, if faithfully performed, are important and valuable, and the compensation ought to be a full equivalent. Accordingly they are authorized to pay themselves by levying upon all who use the road a tax, a toll, or freight sufficient for that purpose.

But this tax must be reasonable, fixed, certain, and uniform; otherwise it is a fraud upon the people which no department of the State government, nor all of them combined, has power to legalize.

It is much easier to see the nature and character of the mischief wrought by the present practices of the railroad companies than it is to calculate its extent. If your action depends in any degree upon the amount of the spoliation which the people of the State have suffered and are now suffering for want of just laws to protect them, you certainly ought to direct an official inquiry into the subject and ascertain the whole truth as nearly as possible.

But investigations have already taken place in Congress and the legislatures of several States; complaints founded upon specified facts come up from every quarter; verified accusations are made by some of the companies against others; railroad men have openly confessed their fraudulent practices, and sometimes boasted of the large sums they accumulate by them. Putting these together, you can make at least an approximate calculation. I doubt not you will find the sum total of the plunder they have taken in the shape of excessive charges to be frightful.

Three or four years ago a committee of the United States Senate collected the materials and made a report upon this general subject, in which they showed that an excess of 5 cents per hundredweight charged on the whole agricultural crop of the then current year would amount to $70,000,000. Upon the crop of the last year it would doubtless come nearer a hundred millions. The railroads would not get this sum, because not nearly all of it is carried, but it would operate as an export tax operates—that is to say, the producer, the consumer, or the intermediate dealer would lose that sum on the whole crop, carried or not carried. In 1880 the charges from Chicago to the eastern markets were raised from 10 cents per hundredweight to 35 cents, the latter rate being unquestionably twice as high as a fair one. You can count from this date the terrible loss sustained by the land, labor, and trade of the country. It was the end and the attainment of a combination still subsisting between the great trunk lines, as they are called, to pool their receipts, to stop all competition, to unite the stealing power of all into one grand monopoly and put the whole people at their mercy. It was a criminal conspiracy by the common and statute laws of all the States.

We are often told that in this struggle for honest government against the power of the railroad corporations the just cause has no chance of success. We do seem to be out on a forlorn hope. The little finger of monopoly is thicker than the loins of the law.

The influence of our enemies over the legislature is mysterious, incalculable, and strong enough to make the constitution a dead letter in spite of oaths to obey it, and a popular demand, almost universal, to enforce it. There is no other subject upon which the press is so shy as upon this, the most important of all. Afraid to oppose the corrupt corporations and ashamed to defend them, it sinks into neutrality. Prudent politicians always want a smooth road to run on, and the right path here is full of impediments. In this state of things we seem weaker than we really are, for the unbroken heart of the people is on the side of justice, equality, and truth. Monopolists may sneer at our blundering leadership and the unorganized condition of our common file, but they had better bethink them that when the worst comes to the worst our raw militia is numerous enough to overwhelm their regulars, well paid and well drilled as they are. They have destroyed the business of hundreds for one that they have favored. For every millionaire they have made ten thousand paupers, and the injured parties lack no gall to make the oppression bitter.

The people certainly got one immense advantage over the carrying corporations when they adopted the seventeenth article of the constitution. That concedes to us all the rights we ask, puts the flag of the Commonwealth into our hands, and consecrates our warfare. The malign influence that heretofore has palsied the legislative arm can not last forever. We will continue to elect representatives again and again and every man shall swear upon the gospel of God that he will do us the full and perfect justice which the Constitution demands. At last we will rouse the "conscience of a majority, screw their courage to the sticking place, and get the appropriate legislation" which we need so sorely.

Whenever a majority in both houses becomes independent enough to throw off the chains which now bind them to the service of monopoly; when frequent repetitions of the oath to obey the constitution shall impress its obligations upon their hearts; when admonition and reproof from within and without—"line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little"—shall have taught them that fidelity to the rights of the people is a higher virtue than subserviency to the mere interests of a corrupt corporation; when the seventeenth article shall have been read and reread in their hearing often enough to make them understand the import of its plain and simple words, then, without further delay and with no more paltry excuses, they will give us legislation apropriate, just, and effective. A tolerably clear perception of their duty, coupled with a sincere desire to do it, will enable them to catch the shortest and easiest way. All trifling with the subject will cease at once; all modes of evading this great point will go out of fashion; no contrivance will be resorted to of ways not to do it while professing to be in favor of it; our common sense will not be insulted by the offer of a civil remedy to each individual for public offenses which affect the whole body of the people and diminish the security of all men's rights at once. The legislative vision, relieved from the moral strabismus which makes it crooked now, will see straight through the folly of trying to correct the general evil except by the one appropriate means of regular punishment at the suit of the State. Does this seem harsh? Certainly not more severe than other criminal laws on our statute books which apply to railway managers as well as to everybody else. They need not suffer the penalty unless they commit the crime, and they will not commit the crime if you make a just penalty the legal consequence. Pass a proper law to-day and they will be as honest as you are to-morrow. Every one of them can be trusted to keep clear of acts which may take them to the penitentiary. They have been guilty in their past lives and will continue in evil doing for some time to come, because the present state of your laws assures them that they shall go "unwhipped of justice." But threaten them with a moderate term of imprisonment and a reasonable fine, and they will no more rob a shipper on the railroad than they will pick your pocket at a prayer meeting. Your law will do its work without a single prosecution. Thus you could, if you would, effect a perfect reform, and yet not hurt a hair on any head—"a consummation most devoutly to be wished."

But it is not to be expected that such good will come immediately. Nearly ten years ago the legislature was commanded to carry out the beneficent measure of the constitution. For nine years that illustrious body was a dumb impediment to the course of justice, all its faculties paralyzed by some inscrutable influence—dead—devoid of sense and motion, as if its only function was to "lie in cold obstruction and to rot." At last, when it was wakened up by the present governor and reminded of the seventeenth article, it opened its mouth and spoke as one who did not know whether he was sworn to oppose the constitution or to obey it. Some members have shown their utter hostility to it, some have been willing to defend small portions of it, and one senator discovered that it was all equally sacred. But this plan meets no favor. Still, we need not despair. The people and the constitution, mutually supporting one another, will be triumphant yet. Meanwhile let all the railroad rings rejoice. This is their day; ours is to come.

Of this speech Justice David J. Brewer, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, as editor of the work entitled "The World's Best Orations," says editorially, in terms of commendation:

It is doubtful if any other speech on a technical question of law and industrial economy ever produced effects so profound and far-reaching.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Before the gentleman leaves that case, which is a very interesting one, will he tell us what finally became of that railroad property?

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. The legislature of Pennsylvania granted a new charter to the same corporation.

Not long since an able and learned lawyer, Mr. James P. Wilson, whose business it is to represent railroads in my home city, in a public address used the following language in speaking about the Esch-Townsend bill:

> Can you imagine a more ideal scheme for the destruction of private property and one more likely to corrupt our people? And not merely does the proposition involve the rights of private capital and invade the practical freedom of a man to sell his labor in the open market uncontrolled by the Government, but it vests in a commission the power to revise the geography of the country, to nullify natural advantages, to give an inland city the benefit of a location upon the seaboard or upon a great river, and to give to the seaboard city the dignified seclusion of an inland town. I believe this power, with the ineffective safeguards of this bill, is too vast and too dangerous to be wielded by any political government.

The power to make rates is referred to. Here, at least, is one thing upon which all agree: the tremendous and dangerous power was not exaggerated. We all agree here. The opponents of this legislation think this power too dangerous to be intrusted to a commission of men selected for their honesty, probity, and disinterestedness. The friends of this bill think it is too dangerous a power to be reposed longer without supervision with a set of frenzied financiers, whose public duty as railroad directors is in direct conflict with their private interest as shippers.

This same language or its equivalent is familiar to all the Members of this House, as it is one part of every argument that has been made by the opponents of this legislation. What a vicious piece of special pleading it is. This wondrous power. The distinguished gentlemen who have submitted the argument to the Members of this House in pamphlet, leaflet, and book might have gone even further and said that this power to make rates, to fix tolls on the roads of the nation, to tax the nation's commerce as it passes along the highways, might be exercised so as to even repeal the laws of Congress. As illustrative of this, I wish to call attention to a communication which I received recently from the president of the American Potters' Association, Mr. W. E. Wells, of East Liverpool, Ohio. And, by the way, the business of manufacturing pottery is a highly protected one under the Dingley tariff law. The skilled artisans in that trade and business manufacture in this country as fine pottery as can be made in the world. Under the protection afforded them by the Dingley Act, if accorded fair treatment by the railroads of this country, they could supply the American market with the wares which they produce. It is one of the great industries of my district, and I wish to present before this House and the country the simple statement of facts furnished me by the president of the Potters' Association of America.

The following are the published rates from East Liverpool, Ohio, situated on the bank of the Ohio River in the eastern part of the State, to various central and western points in the country as compared with the rates to the same points from London and Liverpool, England.

What does this mean? The railroads in making these rates have gone to the extent of repealing pro tanto the law enacted to protect American potters. There may be some explanation that will look reasonable for these outrageous discriminations, but why should not the enterprising people of my district, engaged in making pottery, have the right to submit this question to an impartial tribunal to pass upon this rate so manifestly unfair to the people of my district? The potters of America are among the most intelligent of all the skilled labor in America. They know that the American Congress intended to protect their labor against all the cheaper labor of other lands. Is it fair to them that the railroads of America, the public highways for commerce, which they own in common with all other Americans, should charge these potters of my district two or three times as much for carrying pottery over the highways as potters in England and Germany are charged for the same service? I am not now entering into a discussion of the merits of this rate, but I do wish to insist that the American potters shall have a right to bring this question before a responsible commission—an impartial commission—a commission the members of which will not own stock in these foreign corporations who are favored upon our highways, and have a chance at least for a square deal.

And now to the argument that this power may destroy one city and build up another, may destroy one man's business and foster another's; it may go to the extent of repealing the protective laws enacted by the Congress of the United States. Conceding all this, recognizing also the fact that this power must be exercised by some one, this bill in its terms enacted for the public welfare, is conservative, is exceedingly solicitous of every legitimate right of the railroad corporations. It leaves this power vested in the first instance with the railroad-rate makers, giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission only the right to supervise and correct in cases where they manifestly do wrong or fail to do right.

This bill calls into existence no new power. It simply puts Government supervision and control over the rate-making power where it has been exercised for the last half century. In the exercise of this power we need not cite instances nor make arguments that this wondrous power has been debauched to private ends. That is universally believed. But whether it has or not, there is in existence no law adequate to restrain such rate makers from such abuse. I have no patience with the argument made that public officials, that the "Interstate Commerce Commission, could not be trusted with this power; this argument starts with the assumption that a railroad company can do no wrong, it claims, as a matter of course, for these companies that charity that endureth all things and believeth all things; "while for the nation's public officials we must assume that they always act from bad motives or false opinions."

The great railway corporations have been operating for years with no sort of supervision; no responsibile public authority looking into their transactions to see whether their charges upon the public highways are reasonable or not. All sorts of schemes of watering stocks and inflating the liabilities of these corporations have been resorted to, evidently in anticipation of the time when the public would awake to the importance of looking into the manner and method in which its roads are managed.

In recent years the attention of the whole country has several times been attracted by the very remarkable spectacle of a great Titanic struggle between certain financiers to gain control of certain railroads. Millions of dollars were expended to that end. Several times the financial affairs of the nation were almost thrown into a panic by the disturbances occasioned by those struggles.

Now, remembering that those railroads were public institutions; that the duty of the management was to administer them with an eye single to the public welfare; that they had a right to collect only reasonable tolls sufficient to compensate the stockholders for the money expended and for no other purpose could one dollar be honestly raised, how inexplicable becomes the actions of those contending forces. The very conduct of these men appears sane only upon the theory that they contemplated the maladministration of their public trusts, such maladministration as would bring to those who gained the control great and personal gain beyond the dreams of avarice. Whence did they expect to derive this great profit except by despoiling the shipper; by extortionate rates or by robbing the stockholders and employees by the payment of rebates to themselves and their associates from money legitimately obtained to pay stockholders and operating expenses? These contests for control are as much out of character, as much a disgrace to our civilization, as it would be for two competing manufacturing companies manufacturing letter boxes to enter into an open, notorious campaign, each striving to place its own subservient creature in the Post-Office Department as purchasing agent.

The administrative department having in charge the great highways of interstate commerce should have all its transactions opened up fully to the gaze of the public.

Oh, but it has been objected that it would be unfair to make
